THE COMPLETE WORKS OF LYOF N. TOLSTOÏ

WAR AND PEACE

Vols. III–IV

THOMAS Y. CROWELL CO.
PUBLISHERS : : : NEW YORK
Copyright, 1899,
by Thomas Y. Crowell & Co.
CONTENTS

PART VI

CHAPTER I. Page 1 (1808)

CHAPTER II. P. 5

CHAPTER III. P. 8

The oak in leaf. Rebirth of joy. Change in Prince Andrei. Decides to go to Petersburg.

CHAPTER IV. P. 11 (August, 1809)

CHAPTER V. P. 15

CHAPTER VI. P. 21

Prince Andrei's absorption in affairs. Intimacy with Speransky. Speransky's personality. Prince Andrei appointed a member of the Committee on Revision of the Military Code.
CONTENTS

CHAPTER VII. P. 25

CHAPTER VIII. P. 30

CHAPTER IX. P. 34

CHAPTER X. P. 37

CHAPTER XI. P. 42

CHAPTER XII. P. 47
Natasha and Boris. Boris charmed. Natasha apparently in love.

CHAPTER XIII. P. 50

CHAPTER XIV. P. 55

CHAPTER XV. P. 59
CHAPTER XVI. P. 63

CHAPTER XVII. P. 67

Prince Andrei dances a cotillion with Natasha. Reminds her of his visit to Otradnoye. Natasha's naïve enthusiasm.

CHAPTER XVIII. P. 70

CHAPTER XIX. P. 76

Prince Andrei calls upon the Rostofs. Charming Natasha. Her singing. Her effect on Prince Andrei.

CHAPTER XX. P. 78

CHAPTER XXI. P. 82

CHAPTER XXII. P. 86

CHAPTER XXIII. P. 91

CHAPTER XXIV. P. 98

Relations between Natasha and Prince Andreï. Prince Andreï commends Natasha to go to Pierre for any help, and goes abroad. Effect on Natasha of his absence.

CHAPTER XXV. P. 102

CHAPTER XXVI. P. 106

PART VII

CHAPTER I. Page III (1809)

CHAPTER II. P. 116.

Nikolai undertakes to regulate the finances. Nikolai thrashes Mitenka. The note of hand.

CHAPTER III. P. 119 (1810)

CHAPTER IV. P. 122

The hunt. The horses, Donets, Viflyanka. The "little uncle." Karal, the wolf-hound. The buffoon, Nastasya Ivanovna. The wolf-hunt. The angry huntsman.
CONTENTS

CHAPTER V. P. 129
Nikolai's prayer. Milka and Liubim. The wolf.

CHAPTER VI. P. 135

CHAPTER VII. P. 144

CHAPTER VIII. P. 155

CHAPTER IX. P. 159

CHAPTER X. P. 164

CHAPTER XI. P. 175
CONTENTS

CHAPTER XII. P. 180

CHAPTER XIII. P. 184

PART VIII

CHAPTER I. PAGE 189

CHAPTER II. P. 195

CHAPTER III. P. 200

CHAPTER IV. P. 207

CONTENTS

CHAPTER V. P. 211

CHAPTER VI. P. 217

CHAPTER VII. P. 221

CHAPTER VIII. P. 226

CHAPTER IX. P. 231

CHAPTER X. P. 237

CHAPTER XI. P. 241
CHAPTER XII. P. 244

CHAPTER XIII. P. 248

CHAPTER XIV. P. 252
Marya Dmitrievna advises the Rostofs to return to Otradnoye. Her proposal to Natasha. Princess Mariya’s letter. Anatol’s letter.

CHAPTER XV. P. 256

CHAPTER XVI. P. 263

CHAPTER XVII. P. 269

CHAPTER XVIII. P. 272

CHAPTER XIX. P. 276
CHAPTER XX. P. 281

CHAPTER XXI. P. 285

CHAPTER XXII. P. 290

PART SIXTH

CHAPTER I

IN the year 1808 the emperor went to Erfurt for another interview with the Emperor Napoleon, and in the upper circles of Petersburg much was said about the magnificence of this solemn meeting.

In 1809 the intimacy between these two "arbiters of the world," as Napoleon and Alexander were called, reached such a point that when Napoleon that year declared war against Austria, the Russian troops crossed the frontier to support their former enemy, Bonaparte, against their former ally, the emperor of Austria; and there was also talk in high life of a possible marriage between Napoleon and one of the Emperor Alexander's sisters.

But, besides these external political combinations, the attention of Russian society was at this time occupied with especial interest with the internal reforms which were inaugurating in all parts of the imperial dominion.

In the meantime, life,—the ordinary life of men,—with its own concerns of health, illness, labor, recreation, with its interest in philosophy, science, poetry, music, love, friendship, hatreds, sufferings, went on as always, independent and outside of political alliance or enmity with Napoleon Bonaparte, and outside of all possible reforms.

Prince Andrei had been living uninterruptedly for two years in the country. All those enterprises on his estates, such as Pierre had devised on his and had brought to no result, constantly changing as he did from one plan to another,—all those enterprises had been accomplished by Prince Andreï without any display, and without noticeable exertion.

He had to a high degree that practical tenacity of purpose which Pierre lacked, and which gave impetus to any enterprise, without oscillation or undue effort on his own part.

On one of his estates, the three hundred serfs were enrolled as free farmers; this was one of the first instances of the sort in Russia: on others, the forced husbandry service was commuted for obrok, or quit-rent. At Bogucharovo, a babka, or midwife, was engaged at his expense to help in cases of childbirth, and a priest was employed at a salary to teach the children of the peasants and household servants.

Half of his time, Prince Andreï spent at Luisiya Gorui with his father and son, who was still in the care of nurses; the other half he spent at his “Bogucharovsky monastery,” as his father called his estate.

Notwithstanding the indifference which he had affected in Pierre’s presence to all the outside events of the world, he eagerly followed them; he read many books, and was often amazed to remark when men came fresh from Petersburg, from the very vortex of life, to visit his father or himself, that these men were far behind him in their knowledge of what was going on in politics at home and abroad, though he had not once left the country. In addition to his enterprises on his estates, and his general occupations in reading the most varied books, Prince Andreï spent his spare time in composing a critical account of our last two unfortunate campaigns, and a project for a change in our military code and establishment.

In the spring of 1809 Prince Andreï went to the neighborhood of Riazan, where his son, whose guardian he was, had estates.

As he sat in his calash, he enjoyed the warmth of the spring sun, and looked at the young grass, the first foliage of the birches, and the first curling clouds of the spring flying over the clear blue sky. He simply did not think, but gazed on all sides, full of joy, and free from care.

He came to the ferry where he and Pierre had talked together the year before. He came to a filthy village, barns, a vegetable garden, a slope with the remains of a snowdrift by the bridge, a hillside where the clay was hollowed into runnels, strips of stubble-field and of shrubbery where the catkins were beginning to show, and finally reached a birch forest which extended along both sides of the road. It was almost sultry in the woods; there was not a breath of wind; the birches, all covered with young, green, sticky leafage, did not even rustle. Out from under the last year's leaves, lifting them up, came the first green bracken and the violets. Scattered here and there among the birches, small evergreens, with their somber hues, unpleasantly reminded one of winter. The horses snorted as they entered the woods, and their coats were streaked with sweat.

The footman, Piotr, said something to the coachman; the coachman replied in the affirmative. But it was evident that Piotr got very little sympathy from the coachman; he turned round on the box toward his barin.

"Your illustriousness, how nice it is!" said he, with a deferential smile.

"What?"

"Nice, your illustriousness!"

"What did he say?" wondered Prince Andrei. "Oh, yes! probably about the spring," he communed to himself, glancing all around. "And how green everything is already!.... so early! The birches and the wild-cherries and the alders are already out.... But I don't see any oaks. Oh, yes, there's one, there's an oak!"

By the roadside stood an oak. It was evidently ten times as old as the birches of which the forest was mainly composed; it was ten times as large round and twice as high as any of the birches. It was enormous. two spans around in girth, and with ancient scars where huge limbs, evidently long ago lopped off, had been, and with bark stripped away. With monstrous, disproportioned, unsymmetrically spreading, gnarled arms and branches, it stood like an ancient giant, stern and scornful, among the smiling birches. Only this oak and the slender evergreens scattered through the woods, with their hue symbolical of death, seemed unwilling to yield to the fascination of the spring and to look at the sun and the spring.

"The spring and love and happiness!" this oak seemed to say. "And how can it be that ye still like to cheat yourselves with that stupid and senseless delusion? It's forever the same old story, and a mere delusion. There is no spring, no sun, no happiness. Look here at these mournful, lifeless evergreens, always unchanged; and here I, too, spread out my mutilated, excoriated branches, from my back and my sides, where they grew, just as they grew; and here I stand, and I have no faith in your hopes and illusions!"

Prince Andrei looked back several times at this oak, as he rode along the forest, as if he were expecting it to say something to him. The flowers and grass were under the oak; but it stood among them as before, frowning, immovable, monstrous, and inexorable.

"Yes, that oak is right, he is a thousand times right," said Prince Andrei to himself. "Let others, younger men, once more hug this delusion; but we know what life is; our life is done."

A whole new series of pessimistic ideas, agreeable from their very melancholy, arose in Prince Andrei's mind, suggested by the sight of the old oak. During all the rest of his journey he seemed once more to live his life over in thought, and he came back to his former comforting and at the same time hopeless conclusion that there was nothing more for him to undertake, that he must live out his life, refrain from working evil, and not worry, and not expect anything.
CHAPTER II

Prince Andrei was compelled by his obligations as trustee of the Riazan property to call upon the district predvodityel, or marshal of the nobility. The marshal was Count Ilya Andreyitch Rostof; about the middle of May, Prince Andrei went to see him.

By this time the weather had become very warm. The woods were now in full leaf, it was dusty, and it was so hot that, as he drove by water, he had a powerful desire to take a bath.

Prince Andrei, in anything but a happy frame of mind, and absorbed in thinking of the business which he had to transact with the marshal, drove into the tree-shaded avenue leading up to the mansion of the Rostofs at Otradnoye. At his right, he heard behind the trees the gay sounds of women’s voices, and saw a bevy of young girls running down as if to cut off his calash. In front of the others, and therefore nearest to him, ran a very slender, indeed a strangely slender, maiden, with dark hair and dark eyes, in a yellow chintz dress, with a white handkerchief around her head, the locks escaping from it in ringlets. This maiden shouted something as she approached the calash; then, seeing that it was a stranger, she ran back again with a merry laugh, not looking at him.

Something akin to pain affected Prince Andrei at this incident. The day was so beautiful, the sun so bright, everything all around was so cheerful! But this slender, pretty young girl knew not, and had no wish to know, aught of him, and was content and happy in her separate, most likely stupid, but still gay and careless, existence. What was there for her to be merry about? What were her thoughts? Certainly not about the military code, or about Riazan quit-rents! What, then, was she thinking about? And why was she happy? Such questions involuntarily arose in Prince Andrei’s mind.

Count Ilya Andreyitch was spending the summer of 1809 at Otradnoye in the same way as he had always done; that is, entertaining almost all the residents of the government with hunting-parties, theatricals, dinners, and music. He welcomed Prince Andreï most hospitably, as he did every new guest, and almost by main force compelled him to stay for the night.

During the course of the wearisome day, monopolized by his elderly hosts and the most distinguished of the guests, who happened to be present in large numbers on account of the old count's approaching name-days, Bolkonsky many times was attracted to Natasha, who was among the merriest and most entertaining of the younger members of the household, and kept asking himself, "What can she be thinking about? Why is she so gay?"

At last, finding himself alone that night, in a new place, it was long before he could go to sleep. He read for a time, then put out his candle, then lighted it again. It was hot in the room with the shutters closed from within. He was annoyed at "that stupid old man," as he called Rostof, for having detained him by the excuse that the necessary papers had not yet come from the city; and he was vexed with himself for having remained.

Prince Andreï got up and went to the window to open it. As soon as he threw back the shutters, the moonlight, as if it had been on the watch at the window and long waiting the opportunity, came pouring into the room. He opened the window. The night was cool and calmly beautiful. In front of the window was a row of clipped trees, dark on one side and silver-bright on the other. At the foot of the trees was some sort of succulent, rank vegetation, the leaves and stalks covered with silvery dew. Farther away, beyond the trees, was a roof glittering with dew; farther to the right, a tall tree, with wide-spreading branches, showed a brilliant white bole and limbs; and directly above it the moon, almost at her full, shone in the bright, almost starless, spring night. Prince Andreï leaned his elbows on the window-sill, and fixed his eyes on that sky.
Prince Andrei's room was on the second floor: the rooms overhead were also occupied, and by people who were not asleep. He overheard women's voices above him.

"Only just once more," said a voice which Prince Andrei instantly recognized.

"But when are you going to sleep?" replied a second voice.

"I will not, cannot sleep; what can I do? Come! this is the last time."

The two female voices broke out into a snatch of song, forming the final phrase of a duet.

"Akh! how charming! Now, then, let's go to sleep; that's the end of it!"

"You go to sleep, but I can't," replied the first voice, approaching the window. She evidently thrust her head quite out of the window, because the rustling of her dress was heard, and even her breathing. Everything was calm and stone-still, like the moon and her light, and the shadows. Prince Andrei feared to stir, lest he should betray his involuntary presence.

"Sonya! Sonya!" again spoke the first voice. "Now, how can you go to sleep! Just see how lovely it is! Akh! how lovely! Come, wake up, Sonya!" said she again, with tears in her voice. "Come, now, such a lovely, lovely night was never seen!"

Sonya made some answer expressive of her disapproval.

"No, but do look! what a moon! Akh! how lovely! Do come here! Sweetheart! darling, come here! There, now, do you see? If you would only squat down this way, and rest yourself on your knees.... a little closer.... we must squeeze together more.... there, if one tried, one might fly away! Yes, that's the way!"

"Look out! you'll fall!"

A little scuffle was heard, and then Sonya's discontented voice saying:—

"See! it's two o'clock!"

1 Dushenka, galubushka.
"Akh! you only spoil it all for me! now go away. go away!"

Again all became still, but Prince Andrei knew that she was still there; he could hear from time to time a little rustling, from time to time her sighs.

"Akh! dear me! dear me! it is too bad! To bed, then, if I must!" and the window was closed.

"And my existence is nothing to her!" thought Prince Andrei, while he was listening to their talk, somehow or other hoping and fearing that she would say something about him. "It's the same old story! And done on purpose!" he thought. And suddenly there arose in his soul such an unexpected throng of youthful thoughts and hopes, opposed to the whole current of his life, that he felt himself too weak to analyze his condition, and so he went to sleep immediately.

CHAPTER III

The next day, taking leave only of the count, and not waiting for the ladies to come down, Prince Andrei went home.

It was already the first of June, and on his way home Prince Andrei once more drove through the birch wood, where the gnarled old oak had so strangely and memorably attracted his attention. The little bells on the horses sounded with still less resonance now through the forest than they did the fortnight before; all the spaces were full of thick leaves, shadows, and shrubbery; and the young fir trees scattered through the woods were no longer an exception to the general beauty, and but partook of the universal characteristics of the season, and showed a soft green at the ends of their succulent young sprays.

The whole day had been hot; now and again there had been threats of thunder-showers, but only small masses of clouds had scattered a few drops over the dusty highway and the sunny leaves. The forest on the left was dark, in shadow; that on the right, with branches glistening with diamond drops and gently swaying in the breeze, was full of sunlight. Everything was in flower; the nightingales broke out in gushing melody, and answered one another from far and near.

"Yes, in this forest here stood the oak whose mood seemed to agree with mine," said Prince Andrei to himself. "Yes! there he is," he thought, as he looked along at the left of the road, and found himself, before he knew or realized it, admiring the old oak of which he was in search. The old oak, as if transfigured, spread out a mighty tabernacle of dark, sunny green, and seemed to swoon and sway in the rays of the afternoon sun. Nothing could be seen of the gnarled branches, or of the scars, or of the old unbelief and grief. Through the rough, century-old bark had pierced the smooth, succulent young foliage; it was incredible that this patriarch should have produced them.

"Yes, this is the very same oak," said Prince Andrei to himself; and suddenly there came over him an unreasonable, joyous feeling of delight and renovation. All the most sacred moments of his life came back to him at one sweep,—Austerlitz, with that unfathomable sky, and the dead, reproachful face of his wife, and Pierre on the ferry-boat, and the maiden enjoying the beauty of the night, and that night itself, and the moon; everything suddenly crowded back into his mind.

"No! life is not ended at thirty-one," suddenly said Prince Andrei, with resolute, unalterable decision. "It is a small thing that I myself know what is in me; all others must know it also; Pierre, and that girl who wanted to fly up into the sky; all of them must learn to know me, so that my life may not be spent for myself alone, in order that they may not live so independently of my life, that it may send its reflection over all other lives, and that they may all live in union with me!"

On his return from his journey, Prince Andrei made up his mind to go to Petersburg in the autumn, and he excogitated various reasons in support of this decision.
A whole series of convincing and logical arguments in favor of his return to Petersburg and even re-entering the army were all the time coming to his aid. It now passed his comprehension that he could ever have doubted the necessity of going back to active life, just the same as a short month before he could not comprehend how the idea could ever occur to him of leaving the country.

It seemed clear to him that all his experiments of life would surely be wasted, and without reason, unless he were to put them into effect and once more take an active part in life. He now could not understand how, on the strength of such wretched arguments, he had convinced himself that it would be humiliating himself, after all his lessons in life, to believe in the possibility of getting profit, and the possibility of happiness and love. Now his reason showed him the exact contrary.

After this journey of his, Prince Andreï began to feel tired of the country; his former occupations no longer interested him; and often, as he sat alone in his cabinet, he would get up, go to the mirror, and look long at his own face. Then he would turn away, and gaze at the portrait of his late wife, Liza, who, with her little curls à la grecque, looked down upon him, with an affectionate and radiantly happy expression, from the golden frame. She seemed no longer to say to her husband those terrible words; she simply gazed at him with a merry and quizzical look. And Prince Andreï, clasping his hands behind his back, would walk long up and down the room, sometimes scowling, sometimes smiling, thinking over the preposterous, inexpressible, mysterious, almost criminal ideas connected with Pierre, with glory, with the maiden at the window, with the old oak, with the beauty of women, and love, which were changing his whole life. And at such moments, when any one came to see him, he was generally dry, stern, and short, and disagreeably logical.

"Mon cher," the Princess Mariya once said, happening to find him in such a state, "Nikolushka can't go out to-day; it is very chilly."
"If it were warm," Prince Andreï replied to his sister, "then he might go out in nothing but his shirt; but since it is cold, you will have to put some warm clothes on him, as might have occurred to you. Now, there is no sense in keeping the child indoors because it is cold, when he needs the fresh air."

He would say such things with all the logic in the world, as if he were punishing some one else for all this illogical reasoning that was secretly working in his mind. Under such circumstances, it was not strange that the Princess Mariya said to herself:

"How this intellectual work dries men up!"

CHAPTER IV

Prince Andreï reached Petersburg in August, 1809. This was the time when the young Speransky was at the apogee of his glory and zeal for the reforms which he had undertaken.

This same month of August, the emperor, while out riding in his calash, was upset, and hurt his leg; he was confined at Peterhof for three weeks, and the only person he would see was Speransky.

During this time two ukases, or rescripts, of extreme importance and most alarming to society, were prepared: the one was in regard to the doing away of court chin, or rank; and the other, in regard to the passing of examinations for the rank of Collegiate-Assessor and Councillor of State.\^ The scheme also provided for a complete imperial constitution, destined to revolutionize the existing departments of Justice, Administration, and Finance, from the Council of State even down to the tribunals of the Volosts, or Cantons, throughout the empire.

Now began to materialize and take shape those vague liberal dreams with which the Emperor Alexander had mounted the throne, and which he had vainly endeavored to bring about with the aid of his assistants, Czartorisky, Novosiltsof, Kotchubey, and Strogonof, whom he in jest called "the Committee of Public Safety."

\(^1\) In the civil service, the kollezhsky assessor, having personal nobility, corresponds to major; statsky sovyetnik, having hereditary nobility, ranks above colonel in the army.

Speransky was then the general representative for civil affairs, and Arakcheyef for all things connected with the military.

Prince Andreï, immediately after his arrival, appeared at court, and at his majesty's levee, in his capacity as chamberlain. The sovereign twice, on meeting him, did not vouchsafe him a single word. Prince Andreï had always before felt that the sovereign did not approve of him, that his face and general appearance did not please his majesty. By the cold look of disfavor which the sovereign gave him, Prince Andreï was still more confirmed in his former supposition. The courtiers explained to Prince Andreï that the emperor's neglect of him was due to his majesty's displeasure at Bolkonsky's leaving the service in 1805.

"I know very well how little control we have over our likes and dislikes," said Prince Andreï to himself. "And, therefore, there is no use in thinking of personally presenting to his majesty the emperor my Memorandum on the military code; but I must let its merits speak for themselves."

He mentioned his work to an old field-marshal, a friend of his father's. The field-marshal gave him an appointment, received him more than courteously, and promised to lay the matter before the sovereign. Several days later, Prince Andreï was notified to present himself before the minister of war, Count Arakcheyef.

At ten o'clock on the morning of the day set, Prince Andreï went to Count Arakcheyef's.

Prince Andreï did not know the minister of war personally, and had never seen him; but from all that he had ever heard of him he was disposed to hold this man in very slight esteem.

"He is minister of war, the confidant of his majesty the emperor; no one need be concerned with his personal characteristics; it is his business to examine my Memorandum; moreover, he is the only person who can put it into execution," said Prince Andreï to himself, as he sat with a number of other visitors of more or less note waiting in Count Arakcheyef's reception-room.

Prince Andreï, during the period of his military service, generally as aide, had seen the reception-rooms of many notabilities, and the various characteristics of those reception-rooms were very distinct in his mind. Count Arakcheyef's reception-room had an entirely different character from anything that he had ever seen. The faces of the less notable individuals who were waiting their turn for an audience with Count Arakcheyef wore an expression of shame and humility; those of higher rank gave a general impression of awkwardness vainly hidden under a mask of ease and ironical derision of themselves, their position, and those who were likewise waiting. Some walked pensively back and forth, some whispered and laughed together; and Prince Andreï overheard the sobriquet Sila Andreyitch, "Andreyitch the Strong," and the expression Dyadya Zadast, "Uncle Push," applied to the count. One general, a man of note, was evidently annoyed because he was kept waiting, and sat with his legs crossed, smiling sarcastically at himself.

But, whenever the door opened, all faces instantly expressed one and the same sentiment—fear! Prince Andreï for a second time asked the officer on duty to take in his name; but he received a scornful, impertinent stare, and was told that he would be summoned when it was his turn. After several persons had been escorted in and out of the war minister's cabinet, an officer, whose frightened and humiliated face had already struck Prince Andreï, was shown through the dreaded door. This officer's audience lasted a long time. Suddenly the bellowing of a disagreeable voice was heard on the other side of the door, and the officer came out, pale, and with trembling lips, and, clasping his head with his hands, hastened through the reception-room.
Immediately after this, Prince Andreï was ushered into the audience-chamber; and the officer on duty whispered, “To the right, next the window.”

Prince Andreï went into the meanly furnished cabinet, and saw, sitting by the table, a man of forty years of age, with a long waist, and a peculiarly long head, closely cropped hair, a face covered with deep wrinkles, brows contracted over grayish green, heavy-looking eyes, and a drooping red nose. Arakcheyef turned his head toward the newcomer without looking at him.

“What was it you wanted?” asked the count.

“I have nothing to ask for, your illustriousness,” replied Prince Andreï, gently. Arakcheyef’s eyes fastened on him.

“Sit down,” said Arakcheyef; “Prince Bolkonsky?”

“I have nothing to ask for; but his majesty the emperor deigned to put into your hands my Memorandum, your illustriousness....”

“Please give me your attention, my dear sir: I have read your Memorandum,” interrupted Arakcheyef, speaking the first words with a certain courtesy; then again, staring into his face, and assuming more and more of a querulous and scornful tone, he went on, “You propose new regulations for the army? Plenty of regulations now. No one fulfils the old ones. Nowadays everybody’s writing new regulations; it’s easier to write ’em than to carry ’em out!”

“I have come at his majesty the emperor’s request, to learn what you propose to do with my Memorandum,” said Prince Andreï, respectfully.

“I have indorsed my decision upon your manuscript, and sent it to the committee. I do not approve of it,” said Arakcheyef, getting up and taking a slip of paper from his writing-table. “Here!” and he handed it to Prince Andreï.

Across the paper these words were written in pencil, without capitals or punctuation marks, and ill-spelt:—

“without basis in common cence as it is only an imitation of the french military coad and no need of changing our own articles of war.”
"To what committee has my Memorandum been given?" inquired Prince Andreï.

"To the Committee on the Revision of the Military Code, and I have added your nobility to the list, but without salary."

Prince Andreï smiled.

"I should wish no salary."

"An honorary member, without salary," reiterated Arakcheysyf. "I have the honor of.... Hey there, come in! Who's next?" he shouted, bowing to Prince Andreï.

CHAPTER V

While waiting for the formal notification of his appointment as a member of the committee, Prince Andreï took pains to renew former acquaintances, especially with persons who, as he knew, were in power, and might be of assistance to him. He now experienced in Petersburg a feeling analogous to that which he had experienced on the eve of a battle, when a restlessness and sense of curiosity had invincibly attracted him toward those lofty spheres where the future is prepared, on which depends the fate of millions.

By the angry criticisms of the older men, by the curiosity of the uninitiated, by the reserve of those who knew, by the eagerness and activity of all, by the portentous increase in committees and commissions,—new ones being, as he knew, appointed every day,—he felt certain that there and then, in the year 1809, in Petersburg, some mighty civil conflict was in preparation, and that the presiding genius of it was to be a personage as yet unknown to him, endowed in his fancy with mysterious qualities, with genius,—Mikhail Speransky. And this vaguely understood fact of reform, and Speransky, its leader, began to interest him so intensely that the matter of the military code was very soon relegated to a secondary place in his mind.

Prince Andreï found himself in the most advantageous position for being well received in the most varied and lofty circles of the Petersburg society of that day. The party pledged to reform welcomed him cordially, and did their best to win him to their side,—in the first place, because he had a reputation for intelligence and great learning; in the second place, because, by having of his own free will emancipated his serfs, he had gained himself the reputation of being a liberal.

The party of the old men, the discontents, naturally turned to him for sympathy in their criticisms of reform, as being the son of his father. The generality of women, society, gladly welcomed him, because he was a rich man, and illustrious, and yet practically a novelty, with that aureole of romance with which he was crowned, on account of his supposed death and the tragic end of his wife. Moreover, all those who knew him in days gone by confessed with one accord that he had greatly changed for the better during the last five years, that time had softened down his asperities, that he had lost all that old pretense, pride, and sarcastic manner, and had now acquired the serenity which comes only with years. He was talked about, people were interested in him, and all were anxious to see him.

On the day after his interview with Count Arakcheyef, Prince Andreï was at a reception at Count Kotchubey's. He had been telling the count about his reception by "Sila Andreyitch." That was the nickname by which Kotchubey called Arakcheyef, with the same expression of masked contempt that Prince Andreï had noticed in the way others spoke of him at the minister of war's reception-room.

"My dear fellow, even in this affair of yours, you can't get along without Mikhail Mikhaïlovitch.¹ He can do everything. I will tell him. He promised to come this evening...."

"But what has Speransky to do with military matters?" asked Prince Andreï.

¹Speransky: of obscure origin; his family name possibly Russified by the priests; from the Latin spero, hence, the "Hopeful"; one of the greatest men of Alexander's time; from foundling to prime minister; intrigued against, banished; and afterward one of the governors of Siberia.
Kotchubey, with a smile, shook his head, as if amazed at Bolkonsky's innocence.

"He and I were speaking of you only a day or two ago," continued Kotchubey, "and about your free laborers...."

"Ah! and so you have been emancipating your muzhiks?" asked an old man of Catherine's time, turning scornfully upon Bolkonsky.

"It was a very small estate, which brought in a very meager income," replied Bolkonsky, trying to palliate his action, in his presence, so as not to irritate the old man to no purpose.

"You seem to be in a great hurry," said the old man, glancing at Kotchubey. "There's one thing I do not understand," continued the old man. "Who is going to plow the land, if they are emancipated? It's easy to make laws, but hard to execute them. If it is all the same to you, count, I will ask you who is going to be the deciding judge when all have to pass examinations?"

"Those who succeed in passing them, I suppose," replied Kotchubey, shifting from one leg to the other, and glancing around.

"Now, there is Pryanitchnikof, an excellent man, true as gold, but he is sixty years old: will he pass an examination?"

"Yes, that is where the difficulty lies, since certainly education is not at all wide-spread, but...."

Count Kotchubey did not finish his sentence. He got up, and, taking Prince Andrei by the arm, led him forward to meet a tall, bald man of forty years, with white hands, with a broad, open forehead, and an extraordinarily strange pallor on his long face. The newcomer wore a blue coat, the ribbon of an order around his neck, and a star over his heart.

This was Speransky.

Prince Andrei instantly knew who it was, and a peculiar feeling stirred his heart, as usually happens at significant moments in life. Whether it were caused by respect, envy, expectation, he could not tell. Speransky's whole figure was of a peculiar type, so that it was impossible for a moment ever to mistake him. Never had Prince Andrei seen any one in the spheres where he had moved, who was so remarkable for the calmness and self-assurance of his motions, though they were awkward and ungainly; or any one who had such a steady, and at the same time gentle, gaze, from his half-closed and rather moist eyes; or any one with such determination expressed in an insignificant smile; or with such a delicate, gentle, monotonous voice; and, above all, such an ethereal pallor of face, shared also by the hands, which were rather broad, but extraordinarily plump, soft, and white. Such white and ethereal delicacy of complexion Prince Andrei had never seen, except in the case of soldiers who had been long at the hospital.

This, then, was Speransky, the emperor's secretary, the sovereign's factotum, and his companion at Erfurt, where more than once he had met and talked with Napoleon.

Speransky did not glance around from one person to another, as men usually do, involuntarily, on first entering a large company; and he did not hurry about speaking. He spoke quietly, assured that he would be listened to, and he looked only at the man with whom he was speaking.

Prince Andrei followed Speransky's every word and motion with the keenest attention. As usually happens to people, especially to those who are inclined to judge their fellows severely, Prince Andrei, on meeting a new personage, like Speransky, for instance, whom he knew by reputation, naturally expected to find in him the full complement of human perfections.

Speransky told Kotchubey that he was sorry at not being able to come earlier, but that he had been detained at the palace. He did not say that it was the sovereign who had detained him. And Prince Andrei remarked this affectation of modesty. When Kotchubey presented Prince Andrei, Speransky slowly turned his eyes upon Bolkonsky, without altering his smile, and continued to gaze at him in silence.
I am very happy to make your acquaintance; I have heard of you, as every one else has," said he.

Kotchubey gave a brief account of Bolkonsky's reception by Arakchei. Speransky smiled more noticeably. "The chairman of the Commission for Revising the Military Statutes, Mr. Magnitsky, is an excellent friend of mine," said he, carefully dwelling on each syllable and each word. "And if you would like, I can give you a personal interview with him." Here he came to a full stop. "I hope that you will find him sympathetic, and willing to further all that is reasonable."

A little circle had immediately gathered around Speransky; and the same old man who had spoken of his chinovnik, Pryanitchnikof, turned to the minister with the same question.

Prince Andrei did not take part in the conversation, but contented himself with observing all the motions of Speransky, that man who but a short time since had been an obscure seminarist, and now held in his hands, those white, plump hands, Russia's fate. He was struck by the extraordinary, contemptuous calmness with which Speransky answered the old man. It seemed as if he stooped down from an immeasurable height to grant him a condescending word. When the old man began to speak louder than the occasion justified, Speransky smiled, and said that he could not judge of the utility or futility of what the sovereign deigned to approve.

After conversing for some time with the group generally, Speransky got up, and, joining Prince Andrei, drew him aside to another corner of the room. It was plain that he considered it necessary to pay some attention to Bolkonsky.

"I have n't had a chance to talk with you yet, prince, owing to the lively discussion into which I was drawn by that worthy old gentleman," said he, with his blandly contemptuous smile, seeming to imply by this smile that he and Prince Andrei appreciated the insignificance of the people with whom he had just been talking. This treatment was very flattering to Prince Andrei.

"I have known of you for a long time,—in the first place, through your treatment of your serfs, the first example of the sort, I believe, and one which I should like to see generally followed; and in the second place, because you are the only one of the chamberlains who has not considered himself abused by the new ukase, concerning the court ranks, which has produced so much talk and criticism."

"Yes," replied Prince Andrei. "My father did not wish me to take advantage of this prerogative; I began with the lowest step in the service."

"Your father is a man of a bygone generation; he evidently stands far above the men of our day, who are so severe in their judgments upon this measure, and yet it aims simply to reestablish genuine justice."

"I am inclined to think, however, that there is some ground for these criticisms," said Prince Andrei, striving to free himself from Speransky's influence, of which he was beginning to feel conscious. It was distasteful for him to agree with him at every point; he felt a strong desire to contradict him. Prince Andrei, who generally spoke fluently and well, now found some difficulty in expressing himself while talking with Speransky. He was too much occupied with his study of the personality of this distinguished man.

"The ground of personal vanity, maybe," quietly suggested Speransky.

"Partly, and also for the sake of the government," replied Prince Andrei.

"What makes you think so?" asked Speransky, slightly dropping his eyes.

"I am a disciple of Montesquieu," said Prince Andrei. "And his maxim, 'The fundamental principle of monarchies is honor,' seems to me incontrovertible. Giving the nobility certain rights and privileges seems to me to be the means of maintaining this sentiment."

The smile faded from Speransky's pallid face, and his expression gained greatly by the change. Evidently Prince Andrei's thought seemed to him worthy of consideration.

"If you take up the question from this point of view,"
he began, finding it evidently rather difficult to express himself in French, and speaking still more deliberately than in Russian, and yet with absolute self-possession, "Montesquieu says that honor, l'honneur, cannot be maintained by prerogatives that are injurious to the service; that honor, l'honneur, is either the negative concept of refraining from reprehensible actions, or it is the true fountain-head of impulse for the winning of approbation, and the rewards that are the fruit thereof."

His arguments were succinct, simple, and clear.

"An institution which maintains this honor, this source of emulation, an institution like the Légion d'Honneur of the great Emperor Napoleon, is not prejudicial, but advantageous to the success of the service, but that is not true of social or court prerogatives."

"I do not quarrel with that, but it is impossible to deny that court privileges have always tended toward the same end," said Prince Andreï. "Every courtier considers himself bound to support his position worthily."

"But you have not cared to take advantage of them, prince," retorted Speransky, his smile showing that, having worsted his opponent in the argument, he was now ready to cut short this special mark of his favor. "If you will do me the honor of calling on me Wednesday," he added, "then I shall have had a talk with Magnitsky, and may be able to tell you something of interest; and, moreover, I shall have the pleasure of a more circumstantial conversation with you."

Then, closing his eyes, he made him a low bow, and slipped from the room à la Francaise, without taking leave, so as not to attract attention.

CHAPTER VI

During the first part of his stay in Petersburg, Prince Andreï was conscious that the whole system of thought which he had elaborated during his solitary life in the country was entirely obscured by the petty occupations with which he was now engaged in the city.

Every evening, when he returned to his lodgings, he jotted down in his note-book four or five indispensable visits or appointments for the next day. The mechanisms of his life, the arrangement of the twenty-four hours, so as to allow him to be always punctual, was at the cost of a goodly portion of his mental energy. He accomplished nothing; he neither thought nor had time to think; and whatever he said in conversation—and said well—was what he had been able to think out for himself in the country.

He occasionally remarked with dissatisfaction that, on appearing at different gatherings on one and the same day, he repeated himself. But he was so absorbed all day long, that he had no time to think out anything new.

Speransky, as at his first meeting with him at Kotchubey's, so also on Wednesday, at his own home, received Bolkonsky graciously, had a long and confidential talk with him, and made a powerful impression on him.

Prince Andrei looked upon so many men as contemptible and beneath contempt, he had such a powerful desire to discover in another the living ideal of the perfection toward which he was striving, that it was easy for him to believe that he had discovered in Speransky his ideal of a perfectly reasonable and virtuous man. If Speransky had sprung from the same class in society to which Prince Andrei belonged, if he had had a similar education and mental processes, Bolkonsky would have soon discovered his weaknesses, his human instead of his heroic side; but now this strangely logical bent of mind aroused his esteem from the very fact that he did not fully understand him.

Moreover, Speransky, either because he prized Prince Andrei's talents, or because he felt that it was necessary to attract him to himself, displayed before Prince Andrei his cool, easy intellect, and flattered Prince Andrei with that delicate flattery which appeals to a man's self-conceit, by tacitly taking for granted that he is the only other man capable of comprehending the full depth of stupidity of all the rest of the world, and the reasonableness and depth of their own ideas.

During the time of their long conversation on Wednesday evening, Speransky more than once said, "With us there is a chance to look on everything that rises above the common level of the commonplace routine;" or, with a smile, "But our idea is that the wolves should be fed well, and yet the sheep kept whole;" or, "They cannot comprehend this;" and all the time his expression seemed to imply, "We—that is, you and I—understand who they are, and who we are."

This first long conversation with Speransky merely served to confirm the feeling produced in him at his first interview with him. He saw in him an intelligent, severely logical man, of immense talent, energy, and tenacity of purpose, who desired to obtain power which he would wield solely for the good of Russia. Speransky was, in Prince Andrei's eyes, the man most able to explain by his intellect alone all the phenomena of life, accepting as of any importance only what appealed to his reason, and, in all circumstances, capable of applying the rules of logic in a way which he had always longed to be able to do. Everything was placed before his mind so lucidly through Speransky's exposition, that he found himself involuntarily agreeing with him on every point. If he raised objections, and entered into discussions with him, it was simply because he was anxious to be independent, and not a mere echo of Speransky's opinions.

Everything was just as it should be, everything about him was good; but there were one or two things that struck Prince Andrei unpleasantly: such were Speransky's cold, mirror-like, inscrutable eyes, and his white, plump hand. Prince Andrei could not help looking at them, just as one is always drawn to look at the hands of those men who are in the possession of power. These mirror-like eyes and that soft hand somehow irritated Prince Andrei. He was also offended by the overweening contempt for men which he had remarked in Speransky, and at the various shifts in his arguments which he used for the buttressing of his ideas. He made use of all possible weapons of thought, especially affecting metaphors; and it seemed to Prince Andrei that he leaped from one to another with too great audacity. Sometimes he set himself up as a practical worker, and flouted visionaries; then as a satirist, and made ironical sport of his antagonists; then he would become severely logical; then suddenly he would rise into the domain of pure philosophy. (This last weapon of proof he was especially fond of employing.) He would take questions to the heights of metaphysics, indulge in definitions of space, time, and thought, and, finding counter arguments in them, he would come back to fresh discussions.

On the whole, the chief trait of Speransky's intellect, and one that amazed Prince Andrei, was his unswerving, unquestioning faith in the power and validity of the intellect. It was evident that Speransky never dreamed of harboring such thoughts as were habitual with Prince Andrei, as to the impossibility of expressing all that came into his mind, or that he had ever doubted whether all that he thought and all that he believed were not vanity. And it was this very characteristic of Speransky's intellect that especially attracted Prince Andrei toward him.

During the first period of his acquaintance with Speransky, Prince Andrei conceived a passionate admiration for him, analogous to that which he had formerly experienced for Bonaparte. The circumstance that Speransky was the son of a priest, which many looked upon as derogatory, scorning a man as a kuteïnik, a priestling, — or a popovitch, the son of a pope, — undoubtedly made Prince Andrei particularly cautious in indulging this feeling toward Speransky, and unconsciously strengthened him in it.

On that first evening that Bolkonsky spent with him, they got to talking about the Committee for the Revision of the Laws; and Speransky told Prince Andrei, with a touch of irony, how this committee had existed a hundred and fifty years, had cost millions, and yet had not accomplished anything; that Rosenkampf had merely stuck labels on all the articles of comparative legislation. "And that is all the result that the government has received from those millions," said he. "We want to give new judicial powers to the Senate, and we have no laws. Therefore it is a sin for such men as you, prince, not to serve at the present time."

Prince Andrei replied that for this it needed a legal training, which he did not possess.

"But there is no one who has, so what are you going to do about it? This is a circulus viciosus, and we must break away from it by main force."

Before a week was over, Prince Andrei was appointed a member of the Committee on Revising the Military Code, and, much to his surprise, nachalnik, or president, of one section of the Special Commission on the Revision of the Laws. At Speransky's special request he took up the study of the "Revised Civil Code," and with the aid of the "Code Napoléon," and the "Institutes of Justinian," set to work on the section entitled "The Rights of Individuals."

CHAPTER VII

Two years before this, Pierre, on his return to Petersburg, from his tour among his estates, found himself involuntarily at the head of the Petersburg Freemasons. He established dining lodges and burial lodges, he gained over new members, labored for the union of various lodges, and for the acquisition of original documents. He gave his money freely toward the building of a Masonic temple, and, as far as it lay in his power, pushed forward the collections for charity, in regard to which the majority of the members were penurious or unpunctual. He supported almost unaided the almshouse established by the order in Petersburg.
His life, in the meantime, went on the same as before, with the same inclinations and dissipations. He liked the pleasures of the table, — good eating and wines; and although he looked upon it as immoral and degrading, he could not keep himself from the gayeties of his bachelor friends with whom he mingled.

Amid the fog of all his various occupations and enterprises, Pierre, however, before a year was over, began to be conscious that the Masonic ground on which he stood was giving way faster and faster under his feet, the more he tried to maintain himself on it. At the same time, he felt that the more the ground on which he stood yielded under him, the more inextricably he was committed to it. When he first entered Freemasonry, he experienced the sensations of a man who unquestioningly sets foot on the smooth surface of a bog. On bearing his weight upon it, he begins to sink. In order fully to persuade himself of the solidity of the ground whereon he stands, he sets down another foot, and slumps in more deeply than before, and, being caught in it, he, in spite of himself, wades in up to the knee.

Osip, or rather Josiph Alekseyevitch, was no longer in Petersburg. Of late, he had done with the Petersburg lodges, and lived exclusively at Moscow. All the brethren, the members of the lodges, were Pierre's acquaintances in every-day life, and it was hard for him to see them as merely brothers, according to Freemasonry, and not as Prince B——, and not as Ivan Vasilyevitch D——, whom he knew in society, for the most part, as weak and insignificant men. Under their Masonic aprons and insignia, he could not help seeing their uniforms and the decorations which they had obtained in the world. Often when collecting the contributions and counting the twenty or thirty rubles received — for the most part in promises — from a dozen men, half of whom were as able to pay as he himself was, Pierre remembered the Masonic oath, whereby each brother bound himself to give all his possessions to his fellow-men, and then doubts would arise, though he would strive not to dwell upon them.
He divided all the brethren whom he knew into four categories. In the first he placed those who took no interest in the transactions of the lodges, or in human affairs in general, but were exclusively absorbed in the mysterious doctrines of the order, absorbed in questions as to the threefold nature of God, or the three primordial elements of matter,—sulphur, mercury, and salt,—or as to the significance of the Cube, and all the symbolism of Solomon's Temple. Pierre reverenced this class of Masons, to which belonged principally the older members of the brotherhood,—and Iosiph Alekseyevitch, in Pierre's opinion,—but he could not share in their pursuits. His heart was not attracted by the mysterious side of Masonry.

In the second category he reckoned himself, and those like himself—seekers, inclined to waver, not yet successful in walking the straight and intelligible way of Masonry, but all the time striving to walk in it.

In the third category he placed the brethren—and they formed the majority—who saw in Freemasonry nothing but superficial formalities and ceremonies, and who insisted on the strenuous fulfilment of these external forms, caring nothing for their real essence and significance. Such were Villarski, and even the Grand Master of the Supreme Lodge.

In the fourth category, finally, were reckoned also the great mass of the brethren, and especially those who had been recently admitted. These were men who, according to Pierre's observation, believed nothing, and desired nothing, and entered the brotherhood simply for the sake of bringing themselves into intimate relations with rich young men endowed with influential connections, of whom there were many in the lodges.

Pierre began to feel dissatisfied with his activity. Masonry, at least Masonry such as he knew it in Russia, it sometimes seemed to him, was founded on mere formalities. He did not dream of doubting Masonry itself, but he was persuaded that Russian Freemasonry was on the wrong track, and had turned aside from its first principles. And, therefore, toward the end of the year, Pierre went abroad to become initiated in the highest mysteries of the order.

In the summer of 1809 Pierre returned to Petersburg. Through correspondence carried on between our Masons and those abroad, it became known that Bezukhov had succeeded in winning the confidence of many persons standing in the very highest ranks of the order, had been initiated into the deepest secrets, had been raised to the very highest degrees, and was bringing back to Russia notions of the greatest advantage for the confraternity. The Petersburg Masons all flocked around him, trying to get into his good graces; and it seemed to all that he was keeping some weighty secret which he was getting ready for them.

A solemn meeting was called of the lodge of the second degree, and Pierre promised to communicate the message with which he was charged by the supreme directors of the order. The session was crowded. After the ordinary business was concluded, Pierre got up and began his speech.

Beloved brethren [he began, flushing and hesitating, and holding in his hand his address already written], it is not enough to keep our secrets in the privacy of the lodge room, it is necessary to act.... to act. We have fallen into a state of torpor, and we must act.

Here Pierre took to his manuscript and began to read:

For the propagation of pure truth, and for securing the triumph of virtue [he read], we must purge men of their prejudices, and spread abroad regulations consonant with the spirit of the time; we must undertake the education of the young, and make ourselves one by indissoluble bonds with men of intellect; we must boldly, and at the same time prudently, contend with superstition, infidelity, and folly; we must organize among the men devoted to our cause bands of workers, united together by singleness of aim, and possessed of power and strength.

For the furtherance of these ends, we must weight the scale, so that virtue, and not vice, will tip the beam; we must strive to make it possible for the virtuous man, even in this world, to receive the eternal rewards for his good deeds. But these mighty undertakings find a tremendous obstacle in existing political institutions. What, then, are we to do in such a state of affairs? Shall we use revolutionary methods? Shall we overturn all things? Oppose force with force? .... No, we are very far from advising that. All violent reforms deserve censure, because they can never do away with evil as long as men are what they are; and, therefore, it is the part of wisdom not to employ violence.

The whole aim of our fraternity should consist in making men consistent, virtuous, joined together in the unity of a conviction, a conviction that it is their duty everywhere and with all their might to oppose vice and folly, and the wasting of their talents and virtues; to raise worthy men from the dust, and unite them into our brotherhood. Only then our fraternity will secure the power of insensibly binding the hands of those who work disorder, and of directing them so that they will not be aware of it. In a word, it is necessary to found a universal, dominant form of government, which shall propagate itself over the whole world, without destroying social ties, or preventing other forms of government from still continuing to maintain their own special rights, and do everything except stand in the way of the mighty object of our fraternity,—which is to make virtue triumph over vice. This was the aim proposed by Christianity itself. It taught men to be wise and good, and, for their own advantage, to follow the example and precepts of the best and wisest men.

At a time when all were immersed in darkness, it was sufficient, of course, to have preaching alone: the novelty of the truth constituted its peculiar strength; but at the present day we are obliged to make use of far more powerful means. It is necessary now that a man, guided by his senses, should find in virtue a genuine charm. It is impossible to eradicate the passions; one must, therefore, strive to guide them to salutary ends; and, accordingly, it is requisite that every man should satisfy them within the limits of virtue, and our fraternity should furnish the means for this end.

As soon as we have enrolled a considerable number of worthy men in every land, each one of them will bring around him two others, and all will be straitly united together; then all things will be possible for our fraternity, which has already been able to do much, through working secretly, for the advantage of humanity.
This discourse produced not only a deep impression, but even excitement, in the lodge. The majority of the brethren affected to see in it the dangerous doctrines of the Illuminati,¹ and Pierre was amazed at the coldness with which it was received.

The Grand Master began to raise objections to Pierre's theories. Pierre, with more and more heat, tried to defend them. It was a long time since they had had such a stormy session. The members were divided into parties: some accused Pierre and criticised him for preaching the mystical doctrines of the Illuminati; others supported him. Pierre, for the first time, at this meeting, was struck by the endless variety of human minds, the result of which is that no truth presents itself alike to any two men. Even those who seemed to be on his side accepted him in their own way, with mental reservations and changes, with which he could not agree, since his chief desire was nothing else than to transfer his thought to others, exactly as he himself understood it.

Toward the end of the meeting, the Grand Master, with some ill-feeling, ironically called Bezukhov's attention to his display of temper, and remarked that it was not so much love toward humanity, as it was the impulse of quarrelsomeness, that had dragged him into the discussion. Pierre made no reply to this, and asked bluntly whether his scheme would be accepted. When he was told no, Pierre, without waiting for the usual formalities, left the lodge and went home.

CHAPTER VIII

Pierre again found himself victim of the old melancholy which he dreaded so much. He spent the three days that followed the reading of his discourse at the lodge at home on his divan, seeing no one, and not once stirring out of doors.

¹ A famous secret society devoted to deistic and republican principles, founded by Professor Adam Weishaupt, at Ingolstadt, Bavaria, in 1776, and numbering two thousand members, many of whom were Freemasons; it spread through Europe and aimed at emancipation from all despotisms. It was prohibited by the Bavarian government in 1784.

At this time he received a letter from his wife, who begged him to grant her an interview, described her sorrow at what had happened, and her desire to devote her whole life to him.

At the end of the letter, she informed him that she was about returning to Petersburg from abroad.

Shortly after the receipt of this letter, one of the Masonic brethren, whom he respected less than the others, broke in on his solitude, and, leading the conversation to Pierre's domestic grievances, took it on him to say to him, in the way of brotherly advice, that his severity toward his wife was unjust, and that Pierre had swerved from the first rules of the brotherhood by not pardoning the penitent.

At the same time, also, his mother-in-law, the wife of Prince Vasili, sent for him, begging him to call on her, if only for a few minutes, in regard to a matter of supreme importance. Pierre saw that he was destined to be overpersuaded, that they were bound to have him reconciled to his wife; and indeed this was not wholly disagreeable to him in the state of mind in which he found himself. It was all the same to him. He now felt that nothing in life was of great importance, and under the influence of the low spirits which had ruled him, he prized neither his own freedom nor his obstinate determination to punish his wife.

"No one is right, no one is to blame, and of course she was not to blame," he said to himself. If Pierre did not immediately agree to a reconciliation with his wife, it was simply because in this condition of melancholy in which he found himself, he had not the energy to take the first step in the matter. If his wife had come to him, he would simply not have driven her away. In comparison with what now occupied him, was it not a matter of supreme indifference to him whether or not he lived with his wife?

Making no reply either to his wife or to her mother, Pierre, late one evening, started off and went to Moscow, in order to have a consultation with Bazdeyef. This was what Pierre wrote in his diary: —

Moscow, November 29.

I have only just come from the Benefactor's, and I make haste to transcribe all my experiences with him. Iosipf Alekseyevitch lives in extreme poverty, and has been suffering for two years past with a painful affection of the bladder. No one has ever heard him utter a groan or a word of complaint. From morning till late at night, except during those hours when he is eating his most simple meals, he devotes himself to scientific work.

He received me courteously, and I sat down on the bed where he was lying. I gave him the grip of the Knights of the East and of Jerusalem. He replied with the same, and with a benignant smile asked me what I had learned and experienced in the Prussian and Scottish lodges. I told him everything that I knew; then I related to him the proposal which I had brought before our Petersburg lodge, and described the unfriendly reception which it had received and the rupture which had arisen between me and the brethren. Iosipf Alekseyevitch said nothing for some little time, and was lost in thought; then he expounded his views in regard to the whole matter, so that all the past was made plain to me as well as the way which lay stretched out before my feet. He surprised me by asking if I remembered the threefold object of the fraternity: —

(1) The conservation and study of the mysteries;
(2) Self-purification and regeneration so as to be able to receive them; and
(3) The regeneration of the human race through striving after such purification.

What is the first and chief of these three aims? Of course it must be self-purification and regeneration. Only thereby can we strive and make our way onward, independent of all circumstances. But at the same time this very aim constrains us to the most arduous labors, and therefore, being deceived by our pride, we lose sight of this aim, and strive either to penetrate the mystery which we are incapable of accepting on account of its purity, or else we make an effort toward improving humanity, when we merely show in ourselves an example of turpitude and depravity. "Illuminism" is not pure doctrine, precisely for the reason that it has been carried away by the charms of social activity and has become puffed up with pride.
From this standpoint, Iosiph Alekseyevitch criticized my discourse and all my activity. I agreed with him in the depths of my soul.

During the course of our conversation we touched on my domestic troubles, and he said to me:—

"The chief obligation of a true Mason, as I told you once before, consists in the perfecting of self. But we often imagine that if we were freed from all the hardships of our lives, we should soon attain this end; on the contrary, my dear sir," said he, "only in the tumults of life can we attain the three chief ends:—

"(1) Self-knowledge, for a man can learn to know himself only through comparison;

"(2) Perfection, which is obtained only by battling; and

"(3) The chief virtue, — Love of death.

"Only the vicissitudes of life can teach us its falsity and stimulate our innate love of death, or our new birth into another and better life."

These words were all the more impressive from the fact that Iosiph Alekseyevitch, in spite of his severe physical sufferings, has never felt the burdens of this life, and yet he loves death, though in spite of all the purity and loftiness of his nature, he never feels that he is as yet sufficiently prepared for it.

Then the Benefactor fully explained to me the grand Square of Creation and demonstrated that the numbers three and seven were the foundation of all other things. He counseled me to avoid a breach with the Petersburg brethren, to take upon myself only the obligations of the second degree, and while winning the brethren away from the dominion of pride, to strive to keep them on the straight road toward self-knowledge and perfection. Moreover, he advised me, above all things, to keep a strict watch over myself, and for this purpose he gave me this note-book, in which I am now writing, and in which I am henceforth to keep an account of all my actions.

PETERSBURG, December 5.

Again I am living with my wife. My mother-in-law, with tears in her eyes, came to me and said that Ellen had returned, and that she begged me to hear her, that she was innocent, that she was unhappy at my putting her away, and many such things. I was well aware that if I once allowed myself to see her, I should not have the force to refuse her request.
perplexity, I did not know whose help and advice to seek. If the Benefactor had been here he would have told me. I shut myself up alone in my room, read over Iosiph Alekseyevitch’s letters, recalled my conversations with him, and, taking all things together, I came to the conclusion that I had no right to refuse her request; and that if it was my duty to offer the hand of help to every one, all the more was it to a person so closely united to me, and that I was in duty bound to bear my cross. But if I pardoned her for the sake of right-doing, then my reunion with her must have merely a spiritual end and aim. And thus I made up my mind, and thus I wrote to Iosiph Alekseyevitch. I told my wife that I would beg her to forget all the past, that I would beg her to pardon me for anything in which I had been blameworthy toward her, and that I had nothing to forgive. It was a pleasure for me to tell her that. No need for her to know how trying it was for me to see her again. I have taken up my abode in the upper rooms of the great mansion, and I rejoice in a pleasant sense of regeneration.

CHAPTER IX

In those days, as has always been the case, “high society,” which met at court and at the fashionable balls, was divided into a number of inner circles, each having its own distinctive peculiarities. The most extensive of these cliques was the “French circle,” based on the Napoleonic alliance, and led by Count Rumyantsof and Caulaincourt. Ellen immediately took a most prominent position in this clique, as soon as she and her husband began living together again at Petersburg. Her salon was frequented by the gentlemen of the French legation, and by the great collection of people distinguished for their amiability and wit, who belonged to that set.

Ellen had been at Erfurt at the time of the notable meeting between the emperors, and had there made acquaintance of all the Napoleonic celebrities of Europe. She had enjoyed a most brilliant success. Napoleon himself remarked her presence at the theater and said of her, “C’est un superbe animal.”
Pierre was not surprised at her success, as far as beauty and elegance were concerned, because, as time went on, she grew more beautiful than ever. But he was amazed that his wife, in the course of two short years, should have succeeded in acquiring the reputation of being "a charming woman, as clever as she is beautiful."

The distinguished Prince de Ligne wrote her eight-page letters. Bilibin treasured up his witticisms so as to get them off for the first time at the Countess Bezukhaya's. To be received at her salon was regarded as equivalent to a diploma of cleverness. Young men read books previous to making their appearance there, so as to have some special subject to talk about; and the secretaries of legation, and even the ambassadors, confided diplomatic secrets to her, so that Ellen was a power in a certain way.

Pierre, who knew that she was really stupid, had a strange feeling of perplexity and fear when he appeared, as he sometimes did, at her receptions and dinner-parties, where the conversation ran on politics, poetry, and philosophy. On such occasions, he experienced a feeling such as a juggler must have, who is all the time afraid lest somehow or other his deception should be found out. But either because stupidity is the one thing needful in the management of such a salon, or because those who are deceived find a certain amount of satisfaction in the deception itself, the secret was not betrayed, and Elena Vasilyevna Bezukhaya's reputation of being une femme charmante et spirituelle was so firmly established that she could say the most astonishing trivialities and nonsense, and all professed themselves charmed with every word that fell from her lips, and discovered in them a depth of thought which she herself did not begin to suspect.

Pierre was precisely the kind of a husband which such a brilliant woman of the world ought by good rights to have. He was a queer, absent-minded fellow, a grand seigneur of a husband, interfering with no one, and not only not spoiling the lofty tone proper to such a drawing-room, but serving as an admirable background, against which to display his wife's elegance and tact.

Pierre, during these two years, — in consequence of perpetually concentrating his mind on transcendental interests, and of his genuine contempt for all things else, — assumed in the, to him uninteresting, society which his wife gathered round her, that tone of abstraction and absent-mindedness, combined with affability toward all, which cannot be acquired by art, and which somehow commands involuntary respect. He walked into his wife's drawing-room as if it were the theater; he knew every one, toward all he was equally cordial and equally reserved. Sometimes he joined in the conversation if it interested him, and then he blurted out his opinions with that thick utterance of his, regardless of the inappropriateness of his ideas, or the presence of the gentlemen from the embassies. But it was a foregone conclusion in regard to "that queer husband" of the most distinguished woman of Petersburg, that no one should take his idiosyncrasies seriously.

Among the young men who daily frequented Ellen's mansion after her return from Erfurt, Boris Drubeskoï, who was now on the highroad to success in the service, was the most assiduous in his visitations at the Bezukhoïs'. Ellen called him mon page, and treated him as if he were a boy. The smiles that she gave him were just like those that she showered on all the rest, but occasionally Pierre had an unpleasant feeling at the sight of it.

Boris treated Pierre with a peculiar dignified and rather grave deference. This shade of deference also disquieted Pierre. He had suffered so keenly three years before from the affront that his wife had put on him, that now he saved himself from the possibility of a repetition of it, in the first place, by renouncing the idea of being his wife's husband, and in the second place, by not allowing a suspicion of her to enter his head.

"No, now that she has become a bas bleu, a blue- stocking, she will never be troubled again with such temptations," he would say to himself. "There is no example of a bas bleu having love-affairs," he would assure himself, as if it were an axiom in which he must infallibly believe, though he could not have told where he obtained it.

But, strangely enough, Boris's presence in his wife's drawing-room—and he was there almost constantly—affect ed him physically: it seemed to paralyze all of his limbs, to waken all his self-consciousness, and take away his freedom of motion.

"Such a strange antipathy," thought Pierre, "and yet he used to please me very much."

In the eyes of the world, Pierre was a great barin, the somewhat blinded and ridiculous husband of a distinguished wife, a queer genius, who accomplished nothing, did no one any harm, and was on the whole a very fine and good young man. But in the depths of Pierre's soul, during all this time, there was going on the complicated and arduous labor of internal development, which brought him into the knowledge of many secrets, and made him pass through many joys and many doubts.

CHAPTER X

He continued his diary, and here are some extracts from what he wrote at that time:—

DECEMBER 6.—Rose at eight o'clock, read in the Gospels, then went to a committee meeting...."

Pierre, by his Benefactor's advice, had entered the service as a member of one of the committees.

Came back to dinner, dined alone (the countess had many guests, who were disagreeable to me), ate and drank moderately, and after dinner copied some documents for the brethren. In the afternoon I went down to the drawing-room and related a ludicrous story about B——, and only when it was too late, and every one was laughing heartily, did I remember that I should not have done so.
Went to bed in a happy and contented frame of mind.

Almighty Lord! help me to walk in thy paths!
(1) To conquer angry passions by gentleness and moderation.
(2) Carnal desires by self-restraint and aversion.
(3) To shun vanity, but not to shut myself off from (a) the conditions of service of the State; (b) from family affairs; (c) from dealings with friends; (d) and from domestic economy.

DECEMBER 7.—Arose late, and after I woke up lay for a long time indulging in slothfulness. My God! help me and strengthen me, so that I may walk in thy ways. Read the Holy Gospels, but without the proper feeling. Brother Urusof came; we talked about the vanities of the world. Told about the emperor's new plans. I began to criticize them, but remembered our regulations, and the words of the Benefactor in regard to the obligations of a genuine Mason,—to be a zealous worker in the government when his services are required, and a calm observer of what he cannot approve. My tongue is my enemy. Brothers G——, V——, and O—— came to see me; it was a meeting preparatory to the initiation of a new brother. They insisted upon clothing me with the office of Rhetor. I feel myself weak and incompetent.

Then the conversation turned on the significance of the seven pillars and seven steps of the Temple. Seven sciences, seven virtues, seven sins, seven gifts of the Holy Spirit. Brother O—— was very eloquent.

The initiation took place in the evening. The new arrangement of the lodge room made a magnificent spectacle. Boris Drubetskoi was the adept. I was his sponsor, and I was also Rhetor. A strange feeling agitated me while I was with him in the dark room. I detected in myself a feeling of hatred toward him, which I vainly strove to overcome. And I should wish really to save him from evil and win him over to the side of truth, but hard thoughts about him arose in my mind. It seemed to me that his sole aim in joining the fraternity was that he might get into closer relations with certain men, creep into favor with those who belong to our lodge. Besides the fact that he has several times asked me whether N—— or S—— belonged to our lodge—which I could not answer him—and the fact that, from my observation of him, he is not qualified to feel proper reverence for our holy order and is too much occupied and content with the external man to desire the improvement of the spiritual, I had no grounds to base my objections upon; but he seemed to me insincere, and all the time that I was alone with him in the dark chamber, it seemed to me that he was scornfully smiling at my words, and I had a strong temptation really to pierce him with the sword which I held at his bared breast. I could not speak with any fluency, and I could not frankly confess my doubts to the brethren and the Grand Master. May the Great Architect of the Universe aid me to find the true way which leads from the labyrinth of lies!

After that there was a gap of three pages in the diary, and then came what follows:

Had an instructive and long talk to-day with brother V——, who advised me to hold fast by brother A——. Many things were revealed to me, though I am so unworthy. Adonai is the name of the Creator of the world! Elohim is the name of the One who directs the universe. The third name, the unspeakable name, means the All. These talks with Brother V—— strengthen me, enlighten me, and confirm my feet in the path of virtue. In his presence there is no chance for doubt. How clear to my mind is the distinction between the wretched knowledge of the general sciences and our sacred, all-comprehensive teaching! Human science subdivides everything, so as to comprehend; destroys everything, so as to scrutinize. In the holy science of our brotherhood everything is coördinated, everything is recognized by its unity and its life. The Trinity is the three primordial elements of all things — sulphur, mercury, and salt. Sulphur has an unctuous and fiery quality; taken in conjunction with salt, its fiery nature arouses a longing in it, by means of which mercury is attracted, seizes it, and from the combination arise various bodies. Mercury is the living and volatile, spiritual being, — Christ, the Holy Spirit, He.

December 15. — Awoke late, read the Holy Gospels, but was apathetic. Afterward, I went out and walked up and down the hall. Tried to think, but instead my imagination brought up an occurrence that happened four years ago. After our duel, Mr. Dolokhof and I met in Moscow, and he said that he hoped that I was now enjoying complete peace of mind, in spite of the absence of my wife. At that time I made him no answer. Now I recalled all the circumstances of our meeting, and in my heart of hearts I reviled him with the most angry words and the most cutting sarcastms. I came to my senses and banished this thought only when I found myself stirred up to wrath; but I have sufficiently repented of this.

After this, Boris Drubetskoi came in and began to relate of various “adventures.” From the first instant, I was annoyed at his visit, and contradicted him. He retorted. I grew angry, and said a great many disagreeable and even hateful things. He said no more, and I recollected myself only when it was too late. My God! I cannot tell at all how to treat him. The cause of this is my self-conceit. I regard myself as superior to him, and consequently I behave a thousand times worse than he does, since he condones my rude behavior, while I feel nothing but contempt for him. My God! enable me in his presence better to realize my own shortcomings, and so to order my life that he too may find advantage in it. After dinner I had a nap, and while I was going to sleep I distinctly heard a voice saying in my left ear, “Thy day.”

It seemed to me in my dream that I was walking in darkness, and suddenly I was surrounded by dogs; but I proceeded without fear; suddenly one small one seized me by the left thigh, and did not let go. I tried to throttle him. And I had just succeeded in getting rid of him, when another, still larger, began to snap at me. I tried to lift him up, and the higher I lifted him, the larger and heavier he grew. And suddenly Brother A— came along, and, taking me by the arm, drew me with him, and brought me to an edifice, to enter which it was necessary to cross a narrow plank. I stepped on it, and the plank tipped and fell, and I tried to climb a fence, the top of which I could hardly reach by stretching up my arms. At last, after great efforts, I hoisted my body up in such a way that my legs were on one side and my trunk on the other. I managed to look around, and saw that Brother A— was standing on the fence and directing my attention to a great alley and garden, and within the garden was a large and beautiful edifice.

Then I woke up.

Lord, mighty Architect of Nature! help me to defend myself from the dogs—my passions—and from the last of them, who united in himself the strength of all the others, and aid me to enter that temple of virtue, the sight of which I attained in my vision.

December 19.—In a vision, it seemed to me that Iosiph Alekseyevitch was sitting in my house, and I felt very glad, and was anxious to entertain him.

It seemed to me that I went on chatting irrelevantly, and suddenly remembered that this would not be pleasing to him, and I felt anxious to approach him and embrace him. But as soon as I came close to him, I saw that his face was transfigured; he appeared youthful, and in a low tone repeated something from the teachings of the order, so low that I could not understand what he said. Then we seemed all to leave the room, and a marvelous thing occurred.

We were sitting or lying on the floor. The Benefactor said something to me. And I seemed to be anxious to manifest my tenderness toward him, and, without listening to his discourse, I tried to realize the condition of my inner man, and the mercy of God, which had overshadowed me. And the tears stood in my eyes, and I was glad that he noticed it. But he glanced at me with a look of annoyance, and sprang up, breaking off his discourse. I was crestfallen, and asked if what he had said applied especially to me; but he made no reply; then he turned a benignant face upon me, and immediately we seemed to be in my sleeping-room, where stands a double bed. And he seemed to ask me, "Tell me honestly, what is your strongest temptation? Have n't you ever confessed it to me? It seems to me that you have."

I was mortified at his question, and replied that sloth was my chief sin. He shook his head incredulously, and I seemed to be still more confused, and replied that, though I lived with my wife, as he had advised, still, I did not live with her as a husband with a wife. To this he replied that a man ought not to deprive his wife of the affection which was her due, and gave me to feel that this was an obligation. But I replied that I was ashamed to begin now, and suddenly everything vanished.

When I awoke, I found myself repeating the text of Holy Writ: "And the life was the light of men, and the light shineth in darkness, and the darkness comprehended it not."

Iosiph Alekseyevitch's face was youthful and bright. On that very same day I received a letter from the Benefactor, in which he wrote of the obligations of the married state.

December 21. — I had a dream from which I awoke with a throbbing heart. I seemed to be in my own mansion in Moscow, in the great divan-room, and Iosiph Alekseyevitch seemed to be coming out of the dining-room. And I immediately saw that a strange change had taken place in him, and I hastened to meet him. And it seemed to me that I kissed his cheek and his hand, and he said:

"Have you noticed that my face looks different?" I gazed at him while still holding him in my embrace, and it seemed to me that his face was youthful, but there was no hair on his head, and his features were greatly altered. And it seemed to me that I replied, "I should have known you had I met you anywhere," and at the same time I ask myself, "Am I telling the strict truth?" and suddenly I see that he has fallen like a corpse; then he gradually came to his senses, and went with me into the great library, holding a great parchment book in manuscript in the Alexandrian style. And he seemed to say, "This I have written."

And he replied to me with an inclination of his head. I opened the book, and on all the pages of this book were exquisite illustrations. And it seemed to me that I recognized that these pictures represented the adventures of the soul with her beloved. And among them I seemed to see one representing a beautiful damsel flying through the clouds in diaphanous raiment, and with a transparent body. And I seemed to be aware that this damsel illustrated the Song of Songs. And as I looked at these pictures, it seemed to me that I was doing wrong, and yet I could not tear myself away. Lord, aid me! My God, if this, Thy abandonment of me, is Thy work, then Thy will be done. But if I myself am to blame, then teach me what I must do. I must perish in my own corruption, if Thou wholly abandonest me!

CHAPTER XI

The Rostofs' financial affairs had not improved in the course of the two years while they had been living wholly in the country.

Although Nikolai had persistently kept to his resolve, and continued to serve in an obscure regiment, where he had no chance of advancement, and therefore spent comparatively little money, still, the scale of life at Otradnoye was so large, and, above all, Mitenka's management was so bad, that the debts rolled up more and more each year. The old count evidently saw but one means of relief, — that was a government position, and he went to Petersburg to get a situation, and at the same time, as he expressed it, to give the girls one last season's amusement.
Shortly after the Rostofs reached Petersburg, Berg had proposed for Viera, and his proposal had been accepted.

In spite of the fact that in Moscow the Rostofs moved in the highest society, without thinking or inquiring what the society was to which they belonged, they found in Petersburg that their position was somewhat absurd and undefined. In Petersburg they were regarded as provincials, and many people who had accepted their hospitality at Moscow without question now did not deign to notice them.

The Rostofs entertained as freely at Petersburg as they had done at Moscow, and around their board gathered a very mixed company: neighbors of theirs at Otradnoye, landed proprietors of good standing but not rich, and their daughters and a Freilina Peronskaya, Pierre Bezukhoï, and the son of their district postmaster, who had a government appointment at Petersburg. Among the men who were on a footing of familiarity at the Rostofs’ were Boris, Pierre, whom the old count had met on the street one day and brought home with him, and Berg, who spent whole days at the Rostofs’, and showed the Countess Viera those attentions which every young man is expected to show on the eve of a proposal.

Not without effect had Berg shown every one the right arm wounded at Austerlitz, and affected to hold his wholly unnecessary sword in his left hand. He described the occurrence so persistently, and made it a matter of such grave importance, that all came to believe in the genuineness and merit of his action, and Berg received two rewards after Austerlitz.

In the campaign in Finland he had also succeeded in distinguishing himself. He picked up a fragment of shell which had just killed one of the general-in-chief’s aides, and carried this fragment to the chief. And in exactly the same way as after Austerlitz, he persisted in giving every one such detailed accounts of his behavior, that all came finally to believe with him that this must have taken place also; and again, after the war in Finland, he received two rewards. In 1809 he was already captain of the Guard, and held a most advantageous place in Petersburg.

Though there were some skeptics who smiled significantly when Berg's merits were mentioned in their presence, it was impossible not to admit that Berg was a strict, brave officer, of excellent standing at headquarters, and a highly moral young man, with a brilliant career before him, and already enjoying an exceptional position in society.

Four years before, Berg, happening to fall in with a comrade, also a German, in the parterre of one of the Moscow theaters, had called his attention to Viera Rostova, and said in German, "Das soll mein Weib werden — She is to be my wife," and from that moment he had laid his plans to marry her. Now that they were in Petersburg together, he compared his own position with the Rostofs', and came to the conclusion that his time had come, and he proposed.

Berg's proposal was received at first with a surprise not flattering to him. It seemed at first thought strange that the son of an obscure Lifland nobleman should offer himself to a Countess Rostova! But one of Berg's most characteristic traits was such a naive and good-natured egotism, that the Rostofs began involuntarily to feel that it would be an excellent arrangement, if he himself were so firmly convinced that it was an excellent, a very excellent arrangement! Moreover, the Rostofs' affairs were in great disorder, so that there was little attraction for wooers; and, worse than all, Viera was twenty-four, and, although she had been everywhere, and was undoubtedly pretty and sensible, she had never before received an offer. So the consent was granted.

"Now you see," said Berg to a comrade whom he called his "friend," simply because he knew that it was fashionable for men to have friends, "you see I have weighed it all carefully, and I should not think of marrying if I had not thought it all over, or if it interfered with any one. But now, on the contrary, my father and mother are provided for. I have secured for them that leasehold on the Baltic frontier, and I can live in Petersburg on my salary, together with what comes from her estate, for I am careful and economical. We can live very well. I don’t marry her for her money; I don’t call that sort of thing honorable, but it’s no more than fair for the wife to contribute her portion and the husband his. I have my appointment; she, her connections and her little property. That’s something in these days, isn’t it? But, best of all, she is a lovely girl, of good character and she loves me.”....

Berg reddened, and added with a smile, “And I love her because her character is well-balanced.... very admirable. Now there’s her sister, of the same family, but a very different person.... a most disagreeable character, and no sense at all, and that kind of thing, you know .... disagreeable. But my affianced .... well,” continued Berg, “you’ll come to us some day to see her.” He had it in mind to say, “to dine,” but he bethought himself and said, “to tea,” and, doubling up his tongue, he deftly sent forth a little ring of tobacco-smoke, absolutely typical of his dreams of happiness.

After the first feeling of dissatisfaction which Viera’s parents felt at Berg’s proposal, the festivity and happiness usual in such circumstances were redoubled; but the joy was not genuine, it was artificial. In the feelings of the relatives regarding this alliance there were mingled elements of perplexity and mortification. Their consciences pricked them because they had never been fond of Viera, and were now so glad to get her off their hands. The old count, most of all, was perplexed. He probably would not have been able to tell what was the cause of this perplexity, but the real cause of it was his finances. He really did not know how he stood or how much he owed, and what he should be able to give as Viera’s dowry. When the daughters were born, each had received as a portion about three hundred serfs; but one of these estates had been already sold, and the other was mortgaged and the payments were so behindhand that it was bound to be foreclosed, and therefore could not be granted as a dower. Nor was there any money to spare.

Berg had already been the accepted bridegroom for more than a month, and only a week remained before the wedding, and still the count had not been able to face the dreaded question of the dowry, and had not broached the subject to his wife. At one time, the count thought of giving Viera his Riazan property; at another, of selling a forest; then of raising money on a note.

One morning, a few days before the wedding, Berg came early to the count's private room, and with a pleasant smile respectfully asked his future father-in-law what he was going to give as the Countess Viera's marriage portion. The count was so confused at this long-anticipated question that he answered at haphazard whatever first came into his head.

"I like it in you that you are careful, I like it; you shall be satisfied."....

And, patting Berg on his shoulder, he got up, thinking to end the conversation then and there. But Berg, still smiling pleasantly, explained that, unless he could know definitely what would be Viera's dowry, and unless a portion of it, at least, were paid over beforehand, he should be under the necessity of withdrawing from the offer.

"You will certainly agree with me, count, that if I should permit myself to marry without having a definite knowledge of what means I shall have for the maintenance of my wife, I should be acting abom...."

The conversation ended by the count, who wished to be generous, and also to avoid future demands, saying that he would give him a note for eighty thousand rubles. Berg, sweetly smiling, kissed him on the shoulder, and declared that he was very grateful, but that he could never make himself ready for his new life unless he had thirty thousand in ready cash. "Or only twenty thousand would do, count," he added. "And in that case, the note would be for only sixty thousand."

"Well, very good," said the count, hastily. "Only you will allow me, my dear fellow, to give you the twenty thousand, and the note for eighty thousand besides. That's the way we'll do it! Kiss me."

CHAPTER XII

Natasha was now sixteen, and the year 1809 was the very one to which she had counted up on her fingers four years before, at the time when she and Boris had exchanged kisses. Since that time she had not once seen Boris. Before Sonya, and always with her mother, when Boris was mentioned, she had freely declared that all that had gone before was childish nonsense, as if it were a settled matter, of which there was no use talking, and long ago forgotten. But in the deepest depths of her heart she was tormented by the question whether the promise that bound her to Boris was to be considered in jest or in earnest.

From the very time when, in 1805, Boris had first left Moscow and joined the army, he had not met the Rostofs. He had been at Moscow several times, and had passed not very far from Otradnoye, but not once had he been to see his old friends.

It had several times occurred to Natasha that he was trying to avoid her, and her surmises had been strengthened by the melancholy tone in which her elders spoke of him.

"In these degenerate days, old friends are easily forgotten," said the countess, more than once, when Boris had been mentioned.

Anna Mikhaïlovna had also been more rarely of late at the Rostofs'; she seemed to hold herself especially on her dignity, and always spoke enthusiastically and boastfully of her son's merits, and the glittering career which he was now pursuing.

When the Rostofs came to Petersburg, Boris went to call on them.

He went to their house with some emotion. His romance with Natasha was the most poetical recollection of his youth. But at the same time he went there with a firm determination to give both her and her parents clearly to understand that those youthful relations between him and Natasha could not be considered binding on either of them. He had a brilliant position in society, thanks to his intimacy with the Countess Bezukhaya, a brilliant position in the service, thanks to the patronage of an eminent personage whose confidence he fully enjoyed, and he had now fully elaborated plans for a marriage with one of the wealthiest heiresses in Petersburg, which, indeed, he might very easily do.

When Boris reached the Rostofs', Natasha was in her room. When she was informed of his presence, she went to the drawing-room almost on a run, blushing and beaming with a more than gracious smile.

Boris remembered Natasha as a little girl, in a short gown, with dark, flashing eyes under her clustering hair, and with a wild, merry laugh. That was just as he had last seen her, four years before; and consequently, when an entirely different Natasha came into the room, he was taken aback, and his face expressed solemn amazement. This expression on his face delighted Natasha.

"Well, would you have known your mischievous little playmate?" asked the countess. Boris kissed Natasha's hand, and said that he noticed a great change in her:

"How handsome you have grown!"

"Why should n't I?" replied Natasha's mocking eyes.

"Don't you think that papa seems much older?" she asked.

Natasha sat there without joining in the conversation between Boris and the countess, and silently studying the husband of her childhood's ideal, even to the minutest particulars. Boris was conscious of her steady and affectionate gaze fixed upon him, and occasionally he stole a glance at her.

His uniform, his spurs, his cravat, the cut of his hair, all were most fashionable and comme il faut. Natasha instantly noticed this. He sat somewhat toward the edge of the easy-chair, nearest the countess, with his right hand smoothing the immaculate, neat-fitting glove that he wore on his left, and he spoke, with a peculiarly delicate compression of the lips, about the gayeties of Petersburg high life, and he called to mind the old times in Moscow, and his Moscow acquaintances, with a gentle irony. Natasha felt sure that not without design he mentioned the names of the highest aristocracy, whom he had met at the ambassador's ball, or his invitations to the N. N.'s' and the S. S.'s'.

Natasha sat silent all the time, looking keenly at him. This glance of hers confused and troubled Boris more and more. He kept turning frequently toward her, and stumbling in the midst of his stories. He did not stay more than ten minutes, and then got up to take his leave. All the time those keen inquisitive eyes, full of mockery, looked at him with a peculiar challenging expression.

After this first visit of his, Boris confessed to himself that Natasha was just as fascinating to him as ever, but that it was his duty to renounce this feeling, because to marry her, an almost dowerless maiden, would be the ruin of his career, and the renewal of their for-er friendship without intention of marrying her would be a base trick. Boris resolved in his own mind to avoid meeting Natasha; but, notwithstanding this resolution, he went again in a few days, and kept going more and more frequently, and at last spent whole days at the Rostofs'. He kept trying to persuade himself that he would soon have a chance to come to an explanation with Natasha, and tell her that what was past must be forgotten, that, in spite of everything, she could not be his wife, that he had no property, and their friends would never consent to their union. But he kept putting it off, and finding it more and more awkward to bring about this explanation. Each day he became more and more perplexed.

In the opinion of her mother and Sonya, Natasha was just as much in love with Boris as ever she had been. She sang for him all her favorite pieces, showed him her album, begging him to write in it; but she never allowed him to talk about the past, giving him to understand how charming the new relationship was, and each day he entered deeper into the fog, never saying what he had resolved to say, not knowing what he was doing, or why he went there, and how it would all end. He even ceased to frequent Ellen’s, though he daily received reproachful notes from her; but still he spent most of his spare time at the Rostofs’.

VOL. III. — 4

CHAPTER XIII

One evening, when the old countess, in nightcap and dressing-sack, with her false curls removed, and with one thin little wisp of white hair escaping from under her white calico cap, was performing the low obeisances of her evening devotions on a rug, sighing and groaning, the door of her room creaked on its hinges, and Natasha came running in, with her bare feet in slippers, and also in dressing-jacket and curl-papers.

The countess glanced around and frowned. She went on repeating her last prayer, “If this couch become my tomb.” Her devotional frame of mind was destroyed. Natasha, with rosy cheeks and full of animation, when she saw her mother at her devotions, suddenly paused, made a courtesy, and involuntarily poked out her tongue, to express her annoyance at her carelessness. Then, perceiving that her mother still went on with her prayer, she ran to the bed on tiptoes, kicked off her slippers by rubbing one dainty little foot against the other, and sprang into that couch which the countess was so afraid would be her tomb. This couch was a lofty feather-bed, with five pillows, each smaller than the other. Natasha jumped into the middle, sinking deep into the feather mattress, rolled over next the wall, and began to creep under the bedclothes, snuggling down, tucking her knees up to her chin, then giving animated little kicks, and laughing almost aloud, now and again uncovering her head and looking at her mother.

The countess finished her prayers, and with a stern face came to the bed; but seeing that Natasha’s head was hidden under the bedclothes, she smiled her good, amiable smile.

"Nu, nu, nu," said the mother.

"Mamma, can we talk now? Say yes!" cried Natasha. "There now, one kiss in thy neck; just one more and that will satisfy me!" and she threw her arms around her mother, and kissed her under the chin. In her treatment of her mother, Natasha seemed to be very rough in her manner; but she was so dexterous and graceful, that, whenever she seized her mother in her arms, she always did it in such a way as not to hurt her, or disturb her at all.

"Well, what have you to tell me to-night?" asked the countess, settling back on the pillows, and waiting until Natasha, rolling over and over, should nestle down close to her, drop her hands, and become serious.

These visits from Natasha, which took place every night before the count came from his club, were a great delight to both mother and daughter.

"What is there to tell to-night? I want to tell you about...."

Natasha stopped her mother's mouth with her hand.

"About Boris?.... I know," said she, gravely. "That's why I came. Don't speak, I know! No, but you may tell me." She took away her hand. "Go on, mamma; he's a dear, is n't he?"

"Natasha, you are sixteen years old; at your age I was already married. You say that Boris is a dear. He is a very dear boy, and I love him like a son, but what do you wish?.... What are you thinking about? You have entirely turned his head, that's evident."....

As she said this, the countess looked at her daughter. Natasha lay looking fixedly at one of the carved mahogany sphinxes that ornamented the bedposts. The countess could only see her daughter's profile. It seemed to her that the sweet face had a peculiarly grave and thoughtful expression.

Natasha was listening and pondering.

"Well, what is it?"

"You have entirely turned his head. What made you do so? What do you want of him? You know that you cannot marry him."

"Why not?" asked Natasha, without altering her position.

"Because he is young, because he is poor, because he is a relative.... because you yourself are not in love with him."

"How do you know I'm not in love with him?"

"I know. Now, this is not right, darling."

"But if I wish...." began Natasha.

"Do cease talking nonsense!" said the countess.

"But if I wish...."

"Natasha, I am in earnest...."

Natasha did not allow her to finish; she seized the countess's plump hand and kissed it on the back, and then on the palm; then turned it over again and began to kiss it on the knuckle-joint of each finger in succession, then on the middle joints, then again on the knuckles, repeating in a whisper, "January, February, March, April, May.... Tell me, mamma, why don't you go on? Speak!" said she, looking at her mother, who with affectionate eyes gazed at her daughter, becoming so engrossed in this contemplation that she apparently forgot what she was going to say.

"It is n't proper, dusha moya! People won't remember anything about your affection as children, but if he is seen to be so intimate with you now, it might injure you in the eyes of other young men who come to the house; and, worst of all, it is torturing him all for nothing. Perhaps he might, by this time, have found some rich girl to marry, but now he is quite beside himself."

"Beside himself?" repeated Natasha.

"I will tell you my own experience. I once had a cousin...."

"I know — Kirill Matveyitch, but he's an old man, is n't he?"

"He has n't always been old! But see here, Natasha, I am going to talk with Boris. He must not come here so often...."

"Why must n't he, if he likes to?"
"Because I know that this cannot come to any good end."

"How do you know? No, mamma! you must not speak to him. What nonsense!" exclaimed Natasha, in the tone of one who is about to be deprived of a possession. "Well, I won't marry him; but do let him come, for he enjoys it, and so do I." Natasha looked at her mother with a smile. "Not with any intentions, but this way," she repeated.

"What do you mean, my dear?"

"Why, this way. It is perfectly understood that he is not to marry me.... but this way!"

"Yes, this way, this way," repeated the countess; and she went into an unexpected fit of good-natured laughter, her whole body shaking.

"Come, mamma, stop laughing at me!" cried Natasha. "You make the whole bed shake. You are awfully like me. You laugh just as easily as I do. .... Do stop!" ....

She seized the countess's two hands, kissed the joint of the little finger of one of them for June, and went on kissing July and August on the other hand.

"Mamma, but is he ever and ever so much in love?.... you think so, do you?.... Was any one ever as much in love with you?.... And he's a dear boy, very, very dear boy, is n't he? Only, he's not quite to my taste — he's so narrow, just like the dining-room clock. You know what I mean, don't you? narrow, you know.... grayish and polished." ....

"What nonsense you do talk!" exclaimed the countess.

Natasha went on: "Don't you understand what I mean? Nikolenka would understand me.... There's Bezukhov,—he's blue, dark blue and red, and he is four square."

"And are you coquetting with him too?" asked the countess, laughing again.

"No; he's a Freemason; I found it out. He is splendid, dark blue and red. How can I make you see it?" ....

"Graphinyushka — little countess; are n't you asleep yet?" cried the count at this moment at the door. Natasha jumped out of bed, seized her slippers in her hand, and escaped barefooted to her own room.

It was long before she could go to sleep. She kept thinking how strange it was that no one could ever understand things as she understood them, or read what was in her mind.

"Sonya?" she thought, gazing at the young girl, who, with her hair in a tremendous long braid, lay asleep curled up like a little kitten. "No, not even she! She is amiable! She is in love with Nikolenka, and that's all she cares about. And mamma can't understand either! .... It is so strange; how clever I am and how .... she is pretty," Natasha went on, speaking of herself in the third person, and imagining that some very intelligent, some most intelligent and most handsome man, was saying this about her. "She has everything, everything," this man of her imagination was saying. "She is extraordinarily clever, lovable, and pretty, besides .... extraordinarily pretty and graceful; she can swim, she can ride horseback splendidly, and what a voice! One might say, a marvelous voice!"

She sang her favorite snatch from a Cherubini opera, threw herself into bed, smiling at the happy thought that she should be asleep in a moment, called to Dunyasha to put out the light; and even before Dunyasha had left the room, she had already passed across into that other, still happier world of dreams, where all things were just as bright and beautiful as in reality, but still more fascinating, because so different.

On the next day, the countess, calling Boris to her, had a talk with him, and from that time forth he ceased to be a frequent visitor at the Rostofs'.
CHAPTER XIV

On the thirty-first of December (O.S.), on the very eve of the new year, 1810, le réveillon, a ball was given by a grandee of Catherine's time. The diplomatic corps and the emperor had promised to be present.

The grandee's splendid mansion on the English Quay was illuminated with countless windows, all ablaze. At the brilliantly lighted, red-carpeted entrance stood a guard of police, comprising not alone gendarmes, but even the chief of police and half a score of officers. Carriages drove away, and new ones kept taking their places, with red-liveried lackeys, and lackeys with plumes in their hats. From the carriages descended men in uniforms, and men adorned with stars and ribbons; and, as the steps were let down with a bang, ladies in satins and in ermine cloaks hastily and noiselessly went up the carpeted entrance.

Almost every time when a new equipage drove up, a flurry of excitement ran through the crowd, and hats were removed.

"The sovereign?" .... "No, a minister." .... "Prince so and so." .... "An ambassador." .... "But did you see his plume?"

Such were the remarks heard in the crowd. There was one man, better dressed than the rest, and he seemed to know who everybody was, and called by name the famous grandees of the time.

Already a third of the guests had arrived; but at the Rostofs', who were also invited, hasty preparations were still making.

In the Rostof family there had been much discussion and excitement over this ball; many were the apprehensions lest they should not get their invitation, lest their dresses should not be ready, lest everything should not be as it ought to be.

Marya Ignatyevna Peronskaya, an old friend and relative of the countess, was to accompany the Rostofs to the ball. She was a lean and sallow lady-inwaiting to the empress dowager, and took charge of her country cousins, the Rostofs, in their entry into Petersburg high life.

They were to call for her at ten o'clock in the evening at the Tavrichesky Sad, and now it lacked only five minutes of ten, and the ladies were not yet dressed.

This was the first great ball which Natasha had ever attended. She had got up at eight o'clock that morning, and had been all day long in a state of the wildest excitement and bustle. All her energies, from earliest morning, had been expended in the effort to have all of them — herself, Sonya, and her mamma — dressed to perfection. Sonya and the countess trusted themselves entirely to her hands. The countess was to wear a dark red or masaka velvet gown; the two girls white crêpe gowns with pink silk overskirts, and roses in their corsages; their hair was to be arranged à la grecque.

The most important part had been already done: their feet, hands, arms, necks, and ears had been washed, perfumed, and powdered with extraordinary care. On their feet they wore open-worked silk stockings, and white satin slippers with bows. Their toilets were almost finished. Sonya was already dressed, and so was the countess; but Natasha, who had been helping the others, was behindhand. She was still sitting in front of the mirror in a peignoir that covered her slender shoulders. Sonya, already dressed, was standing in the middle of the room fastening on a last bow with a pin that hurt her dainty fingers as she tried to press it, squeaking, through the ribbon.

"Not that way, not that way, Sonya," cried Natasha, turning her head suddenly, and putting her hands up to her hair, which the maid, who was dressing it, had not yet had time to finish. "Don't put the bow that way, come here!"

Sonya sat down in front of her. Natasha pinned the bow in a different position.

"If you please, baruishnya, I can't arrange your hair this way," exclaimed the maid, still holding Natasha's braids.
"Oh, good gracious, wait then! There, that's the way, Sonya!"

"Are you almost ready?" the countess was heard asking. "It's ten o'clock already."

"In a minute, in a minute. And are you all ready, mamma?"

"Only have my toque to put on."

"Don't you do it without me!" cried Natasha. "You won't get it right!"

"Yes, but it's ten o'clock!"

It had been decided upon that they should reach the ball-room at half-past ten, and Natasha had still to get on her gown, and they had to drive to the Tavrichesky Sad.

As soon as her hair was done, Natasha, in her short petticoat, which showed her ball-slippers, and wearing her mother's dressing-jacket, ran to Sonya and examined her critically; then she hurried to her mother. Bending her head down she put the toque on it, and, giving her gray hair a hasty kiss, she scurried back to the maids, who were putting the last touches to her skirt.

The delay had been caused by Natasha's skirt, which was too long; two maids were at work on it, hastily biting off the ends of the thread. A third, with her mouth full of pins, was hastening from the countess to Sonya; and a fourth was holding up high in the air the completed crêpe gown.

"Mavrushka, hurry up, you old dove."¹

"Give me the thimble, baruishnya."

"Are you almost ready?" asked the count, coming to the door. "Here is some perfume for you. Peronskaya will be in a fume."

"There! it is done!" cried the maid, lifting up with two fingers the completed crêpe dress, and giving it a puff and a shake, by this motion expressing her sense of the airiness and purity of what she held.

Natasha began to put the garment on.

"In a minute, in a minute; don't come, papa," she cried to her father, who was just opening the door. Her head at that very moment was disappearing under the cloud of crêpe. Sonya closed the door. But in a moment the count was admitted. He wore a blue dress-coat, short clothes, and buckled shoes, and was scented and pomaded.

¹ Galubushka.

"Oh! papa, how handsome you look! Charming!" cried Natasha, as she stood in the middle of the chamber and adjusted the folds of her skirt.

"Excuse me, baruishnya, excuse me," said one of the maids, who was on her knees pulling the skirts; and she shifted the pins from one side of her mouth to the other, with a deft motion of her tongue.

"Mercy on us!" cried Sonya, with despair in her voice, scrutinizing Natasha's dress. "Mercy on us! it's too long now!"

Natasha made a few steps so as to look into the pier-glass. The skirt was indeed too long.

"Good gracious! sudaruinya, it is n't too long, at all," said Mavrusha, crawling along on the floor after her young mistress.

"Well, if it's too long, then let us tack it up; we can do it in a second," said Dunyasha, in a decisive tone, taking a needle from the bosom of her dress, and again sitting on the floor, to baste up the bottom of the skirt.

At this instant, the countess, in her toque and velvet robe, came timidly into the room with noiseless steps.

"Oo! Oo! my beauty!" cried the count. "You are the best of them all!"....

He tried to give her a hug and a kiss, but she blushed and pushed him away, so as not to rumple her dress.

"Mamma, your toque wants to be more to one side," cried Natasha. "I will pin it on," and she sprang forward so quickly that the maids, who were at work on the skirt, did not have time to let go, and a piece of the crêpe was torn.

"Good heavens! what has happened?.... Truly, it was not my fault."....

"No matter; it won't be seen," said Dunyasha.

"O my beauty! a real queen!" cried the old nurse, looking in at the door. "And Sonyushka, too; well, they are beauties!"....

By quarter-past ten, finally, all were seated in the carriage and on their way. But they had still to stop at the Tavrichesky Sad.

Peronskaya was all ready and waiting for them. Notwithstanding her advanced age, and her lack of charms, almost exactly the same thing had taken place in her case as with the Rostofs, though, of course, with no haste and flurry, for this was an old story with her; but her unbeautiful old body had been washed and scented and powdered in just the same way, and she had been just as scrupulous in washing behind her ears; and just as at the Rostofs', her ancient maid had enthusiastically contemplated the adornment of her mistress, when, dressed in her yellow robe with the monogram, she had come down into the drawing-room.

Peronskaya praised the Rostofs' toilets and the Rostofs extolled her taste and her toilet; and at last, at eleven o'clock, taking great care of their hair and their gowns, they stowed themselves away in the carriages, and drove off.

CHAPTER XV

Natasha, since that morning, had not had a moment's freedom; and not once had she taken time to think of what was before her.

In the raw, chill atmosphere, in the narrow, dimly lighted, swaying carriage, she, for the first time, vividly saw in her imagination what was waiting for her there, at the ball, in the lighted halls,—the music, the flowers, the dances, the sovereign, all the brilliant youth of the city. Fancy pictured it in such attractive colors, that she could hardly believe that it was going to be realized; it was all in such vivid contrast with the impression of the chill, the narrowness, and darkness of the carriage. She realized all that was awaiting her only at the moment when, having passed along the red-carpeted entrance, she went into the vestibule and took off her shuba, and, together with Sonya, preceded her mother up the grand staircase lined with flowering plants. Then only it came over her with what propriety she must behave at a ball, and she tried to assume that dignified manner which she felt to be the proper thing for a young maiden on such an occasion.

But, fortunately for her, she was conscious that her eyes were wandering; she could not distinguish anything clearly; her heart was beating a hundred a minute, and her pulses throbbed almost painfully. It was impossible for her to assume any such manner, and it would have been ridiculous in her; and so she walked along, trembling with excitement, and trying with all her might to hide it; and this was the very manner which, more than any other, was becoming to her. Behind them, and in front of them, other guests were mounting the stairs, also talking in low tones, and dressed in ball costumes. The mirrors on the landings reflected visions of ladies in white, blue, and pink gowns, with diamonds and pearls on their bare arms and bosoms.

Natasha glanced into the mirrors, but in the reflection she could not distinguish herself from among the others; all were commingled and confused in one glittering procession. As they reached the door leading into the first ball-room, an unbroken roar of voices, footsteps, and greetings deafened Natasha; the lights and brilliant toilets still more dazzled her. The host and hostess, who had been half an hour standing near the entrance and repeating over the same words of welcome, "Charmé de vous voir," met the Rostofs and Peronskaya in the same way.

The two young girls, in their white gowns, each with a single rose in her dark locks, went in and courtesied exactly alike; but involuntarily the hostess let her glance rest longer on the slender little Natasha. She looked at her and smiled on her alone with a special graciousness; to the others she was only the hostess. As she looked at her, she perhaps remembered the golden days of her girlhood, which would never more return, and her own
The host also followed Natasha with his glance, and asked the count which of the two was his daughter.

“Charmante!” said he, kissing his finger-tips.

In the great ball-room, the guests were crowded together near the entrance, awaiting the coming of the sovereign. The countess took her place in the front row of this group. Natasha had had her ears open, and was conscious that several had asked who she was, and had looked at her. She realized that she was making a pleasant impression on those whose attention she had attracted, and this fact somewhat calmed her agitation.

“There are some just like ourselves, and some not so good,” she thought.

Peronskaya was pointing out to the countess the most notable personages in the ball-room.

“There! that’s the Dutch ambassador, see,—that gray-headed man,” said Peronskaya, directing the countess’s attention to a gentleman with abundant curly hair, silver-white. He was surrounded by ladies, whom he had just set to laughing by some remark.

“Ah! and there is the tsaritsa of Petersburg, the Countess Bezukhaya,” she exclaimed, indicating Ellen, who had just entered. “How handsome she is! she does not stand second even to Marya Antonovna. Just see how young and old stare after her. She’s both handsome and intelligent. .... They say Prince——has gone daft about her. And see those two, there! They are not pretty at all, but what a following they have!”

She indicated a lady and her extremely plain daughter, who were just crossing the ball-room.

“That girl is the heiress to millions,” said Peronskaya; “and there are her suitors. That’s the Countess Bezukhaya’s brother, Anatol Kuragin,” said she, calling attention to a handsome young cavalryman, who was just then passing them, holding his head very high, and not deigning to give the ladies any recognition. “How handsome he is! is n’t he? They say he’s going to marry this heiress; and your cousin, Drubetskoï, is also after her; they say she has millions. .... Who? Oh!
that is the French ambassador himself," she replied to the countess, who asked who Caulaincourt was. "Just see, he is like some tsar! And yet they are all so pleasant, so very pleasant—these French. Ah! and there she is! After all, there is no one who can be compared to our Marya Antonovna. And how simply she is dressed! Charming!—And that stout man yonder, in spectacles, is the universal Freemason," said she, pointing out Bezukhot. "Compare him with his wife! what a ridiculous creature!"

Pierre walked along, his stout form swaying, and pushed through the throng, bowing to right and left, carelessly and good-naturedly, as if he were making his way through the swarms of a market-place. He passed along, evidently in search of some one.

Natasha was glad to see Pierre's well-known face, even if he was "a ridiculous creature," to use the words of Peronskaya; and she knew that it was her party, and herself in particular, of whom Pierre was in search. Pierre had promised that he would attend the ball and find partners for her.

But before he reached where they stood, Pierre stopped near a short and very handsome dark-featured cavalryman, in a white uniform, who was standing by the window and conversing with a tall man with stars and a ribbon. Natasha instantly recognized the short young man in the white uniform: it was Bolkonsky, who seemed to her to have grown younger, gayer, and handsomer.

"There's another of our acquaintance—Bolkonsky—do you see him, mamma?" asked Natasha, indicating Prince Andrei. "Do you remember? he spent a night with us at Otradnoye."

"Ah, indeed! so you know him, then?" asked Peronskaya. "I cannot endure him. Il fait à présent la pluie et le beau temps! ¹ There's no end to his pride. He's like his father. And now he's hand in glove with Speransky; they are concocting all sorts of schemes.

¹ "From him now we must look for our good weather or our rain;" a French proverb, signifying his success.—Author's Note.
See how he treats the ladies! one just spoke to him, and he turned his back on her! I’d give him a lesson if he treated me as he did those ladies."

CHAPTER XVI

Suddenly there was a general stir: a whisper ran through the throng, which pressed forward and then divided again, making two rows, between which came the sovereign, to the strains of the band which just then began to play. He was followed by the host and hostess. The sovereign passed along, hastily bowing to the right and left, as if he were anxious to have done as soon as possible with these first formalities. The musicians played a polonaise then famous, on account of the words which had been set to it. These words began, "Alek-sandr, Yelizavvjeta, you enrapture us."....

The sovereign entered the drawing-room. The throng pushed toward the doors; several personages, with anxious faces, in great haste, rushed hither and thither. The throng again moved away from the drawing-room door, where the sovereign made his appearance, engaged in conversation with the hostess. A young man, with an expression of annoyance on his face, came along and begged the ladies to step back. Several ladies, with eager faces, showing absolute disregard of all the conventional rules of good breeding, pushed forward, to the imminent risk of their toilets. The gentlemen began to select partners, and get into position for the polonaise.

Space was cleared; and the sovereign, with a smile, stepping out of time, passed into the ball-room, leading the lady of the house by the hand.

They were followed by the host, with Marya Anto novna Naruishkina; then ambassadors, ministers, and various generals, whom Peronskaya indefatigably called by name.

More than half of the ladies had partners, and were already dancing or beginning to dance the polonaise.

Natasha felt that she and Sonya, as well as her mother, were neglected with that minority of ladies who lined the walls, and were not invited to take part in the polonaise. She stood with her slender arms hanging by her sides; with her maidenly bosom, as yet scarcely defined, regularly rising and falling with long inspirations; and she looked straight ahead with brilliant eyes full of alarm, indicating that she was ready for the greatest enjoyment or the greatest disappointment.

She was not interested now in the sovereign, or in any of those distinguished personages whom Peronskaya was calling their attention to; she had only one thought,— "Is n't any one coming to invite me? Can it be that I am not going to be taken out for the first dance? Won't any of those men notice me? — of those men who now do not seem to see me; or, if they see me, look at me as much as to say, 'Oh, she's nothing,—she's nothing to look at!' No, it cannot be!" said she to herself. "They must know how I am longing to dance, and how splendidly I dance, and how much they would enjoy it if they danced with me!"

The strains of the polonaise, which had now lasted some little time, began to have a melancholy cadence in Natasha's ears,—as if connected with sad memories. She felt like having a good cry. Peronskaya had left them; the count was at the other end of the ball-room; she and Sonya and the countess were as much alone, in this throng of strangers, as if they were in the woods; no one took any interest in them, or looked out for them.

Prince Andrei passed them with a lady on his arm, and evidently did not recollect them. The handsome Anatol, smiling, said something to the lady with whom he was promenading, and looked into Natasha's face as one looks at a wall. Twice Boris passed them, and each time turned his head away. Berg and his wife, who were not dancing, joined them.

Natasha felt mortified to death at this family gathering, there, at the ball; as if they had no other place for family confidences than in a ball-room. She did not look at Viera, or listen to what she had to say about her emerald-green dress.
At last the sovereign sat down near his last partner—he had danced with three—and the music ceased. An officious aide bustled up to the Rostofs, begging them to move back a little more, and this although they almost touched the wall; and then from the gallery was heard the rhythmical, smooth, and enticing sounds of the waltz.

The sovereign, with a smile, glanced down the ballroom. A moment passed, and no one had as yet begun. The aide, who acted as master of ceremonies, approached the Countess Bezukhaya, and asked her to dance. She accepted with a smile, and then, without looking at him, laid her hand on his shoulder. The aide, who was a master of his business, calmly, deliberately, and with all self-confidence, placing his arm firmly about her waist, at first started off with her in the glissade around the edge of the circle; then, when they reached the end of the ball-room, he took her right hand with his left, turned her around, and, while the sounds of the waltz grew more and more rapid, the clicking of the aide's spurs could be heard, as his agile and skilful feet beat the time of the rhythm; while on the third beat, at every turn, his partner's velvet dress floated out and seemed to fly. Natasha gazed at them, and was ready to weep that it was not she herself who was leading this first waltz.

Prince Andrei, in the white uniform of a colonel of cavalry, in silk stockings and shoe-buckles, stood, full of life and radiant with happiness, in the front row of the circle, not far from the Rostofs. Baron Firhof was talking to him about the first meeting of the Imperial Council, which had been appointed for the next day. Prince Andrei, as an intimate friend of Speransky, and one who had shared in the labors of the Legislative Committee, might be able to give authentic information in regard to the approaching session, concerning which there were various rumors. But Prince Andrei was not listening to what Firhof was saying, and looked now at the sovereign, and now at the various gentlemen who were all ready to dance, but had not the necessary courage to take the floor.
Prince Andreï was observing these gentlemen, who showed such timidity in the presence of their sovereign, and the ladies, whose hearts were sinking within them with desire to be invited.

Pierre came up to Prince Andreï and took him by the arm.

"You are always ready for a dance. My protégée, the little Rostova, is here; do invite her!" said he.

"Where?" asked Bolkonsky. "I beg your pardon," he added, turning to the baron. "We will finish this conversation at another time; but at balls it is our duty to dance."

He went in the direction indicated by Pierre. Natasha's despairing, melancholy face attracted Prince Andreï's attention. He recognized her, and divined her feeling; and, realizing that she was just "coming out," and remembering her conversation, he went with a beaming countenance up to the Countess Rostova.

"Allow me to make you acquainted with my daughter," said the countess, with a blush.

"I have had the pleasure of meeting her before, but perhaps the countess does not remember me," said Prince Andreï, with a low and respectful bow, entirely belying Peronskaya's spiteful observation about his rudeness. Approaching Natasha, he started to put his arm around her waist, even before he had actually invited her to dance with him. Then he proposed that they should take a turn of the waltz. Natasha's face, with its melancholy expression, ready to sink to despair or become radiant, was suddenly lighted up with a happy, childlike smile of gratitude.

'I had been waiting long for you,' this timid and radiant young maiden seemed to say, by this smile flashing out from under the tears that had been almost ready to start, as she put her hand on Prince Andreï's shoulder. They were the second couple that ventured out upon the floor. Prince Andreï was one of the best dancers of his time. Natasha danced exquisitely; her dainty little feet, shod in her satin slippers, performed their duty with perfect ease and agility, independently of her volition; and her face beamed with triumphant delight.

Her bare neck and arms were thin and far from pretty, compared with Ellen's charms. Her shoulders were slim, her figure undeveloped, her arms slender; but Ellen seemed to be already covered with an enamel left by the thousand glances that had glided over her form, while Natasha seemed like a maiden who for the first time appeared in a low-necked gown, and would feel very much mortified if she were not assured that it was the proper thing.

Prince Andrei liked to dance, and, as he wanted to escape as soon as possible from the political and intellectual remarks with which all approached him, and to break up, as soon as possible, that tiresome circle of people abashed by the presence of the sovereign,—he was ready to dance; and he chose Natasha because Pierre had suggested her, and because she happened to be the first among all the pretty women who attracted his attention. But as soon as he clasped her slender, supple form, and she began to move so close to him, and smiled up into his face, the wine of her fascination mounted to his head; he felt a renewed energy and fresh life when, having released her, he stopped and began to look at the other dancers.

CHAPTER XVII

Following Prince Andrei's example, Boris came and invited Natasha to dance with him; also the master of ceremonies, who had opened the ball, and several other young men; and Natasha, turning her superfluity of partners over to Sonya, flushed and happy, did not miss a single dance throughout the rest of the evening.

She had eyes for nothing else, and she did not notice what had attracted the attention of every one else at the ball. She did not once remark how the emperor had a long conversation with the French ambassador; or how he showed signal favor to a certain lady who was present; or how Prince So-and-So and So-and-So said and did this, that, and the other thing; or how Ellen enjoyed a brilliant success and attracted the special attention of such and such a person: she did not even see the sovereign, and only noticed that he had withdrawn by the fact that, after his departure, the ball became livelier than ever.

Just before supper, Prince Andrei danced one of the jolliest of cotillions with Natasha. He reminded her of their first meeting on the Otradnoye driveway, and how she could not go to sleep that moonlight night, and how he had involuntarily overheard what she said. Natasha blushed at this reminiscence, and tried to excuse herself, as if there were something of which she ought to be ashamed in the consciousness that Prince Andrei had accidentally overheard her.

Prince Andrei, like all men who had grown up in society, liked to meet any one that was free from the stereotyped imprint of fashionable high life; and such a person was Natasha, with her admiration, her enjoyment, and her modesty, and even her mistakes in speaking French.

He treated her, and spoke to her, with a peculiar delicacy and affectionate courtesy. As he sat next to her, talking on the simplest and most insignificant topics, Prince Andrei admired the merry gleam in her eyes, and her smile, answering not to what was said to her so much as to her inward happiness. If, by chance, Natasha was invited to dance, and got up with a smile, and went dancing across the room, Prince Andrei found especial delight in watching her fawn-like grace. In the midst of the cotillion, Natasha, having just danced out one figure, came back to her place, still panting. A new partner again invited her out. She was tired and out of breath, and evidently at first inclined to refuse; but instantly placed her hand on the cavalier's shoulder, and gave Prince Andrei a smile.

'I should like very much to get my breath, and sit with you,—I am tired,—but you see how I am in demand; and that pleases me, and I am happy, and I love you all,' and you and I understand it all;' this, and much more besides, this smile of hers seemed to say. When her partner released her, Natasha glided across the room to choose two ladies for the figure.

"If she speaks to her cousin first, and then to the other lady, she will be my wife!" said Prince Andrei, unexpectedly even to himself, as he looked at her.

She went to her cousin first!

"What nonsense sometimes enters one's head!" said Prince Andrei to himself. "But it is quite evident that this maiden is so sweet, and so unlike anybody else, that she won't be kept dancing here for a month; she'll be engaged or married. .... There's no one like her here!" he thought, as Natasha, smoothing out the crumpled petals of a rose in her corsage, came back and resumed her place next him.

At the end of the cotillion the old count, in his blue coat, came up to the dancers. He invited Prince Andrei to call and see them, and he asked his daughter if she had been having a good time. Natasha at first did not reply, except by a smile which had a sort of reproach in it, as much as to say, 'How can you ask such a question?'

"The jolliest time I ever had in my life," said she; and Prince Andrei noticed how she made a quick motion to raise her slender arms, as if to embrace her father, and instantly dropped them again. Natasha was happier than she had ever been in her life before; she had reached that lofty height of bliss, when a person becomes perfectly good and lovely, and cannot believe in the existence or the possibility of wickedness, unhappiness, and sorrow.

Pierre, at this ball, for the first time had a realizing sense of the humiliating position in which he was placed by the status occupied by his wife in court society. He was morose and absent-minded. A deep frown furrowed his brow; and, as he stood by the window, he glared through his spectacles, and yet saw nothing.

Natasha, as she went down to supper, passed by him
His gloomy, unhappy face struck her. She paused in front of him; she felt a desire to help him, to share with him the superfluity of her own happiness.

“How jolly it is, count,” said she. “Is n’t it?”

Pierre gave her a distracted smile, evidently not understanding what she said.

“Yes, I am very glad,” he replied.

“How can any one be dissatisfied with anything?” wondered Natasha. “Especially such a good fellow as that Bezukhoi.”

In Natasha’s eyes, all who were at the ball were alike good, sweet, lovely men, full of affection toward one another; hatred was out of the question, and therefore all ought to be happy.

CHAPTER XVIII

On the next day Prince Andrei remembered the ball of the evening before, but it soon passed out of his mind.

“Yes, it was a very brilliant ball; and besides.... yes, the little Rostof girl was very captivating. There’s something peculiarly fresh about her, very original and un-Petersburg-like!”

That was the extent of the thought that he gave to the ball; and, after he had drunk his tea, he sat down to his labors. But, either because of his weariness, or his sleepless night, the day was unpropitious for work and he could not accomplish anything; he kept finding fault with his own work, as was often the case with him, and he was glad when word was brought that some one had come to see him.

The visitor was Bitsky, who had served on various committees, and frequented all the different cliques of Petersburg society. He was a zealous supporter of the new ideas and of Speransky, and was an indefatigable gossip-monger: one of those men who follow the fashion in their opinions as in their clothes, and who, for that very reason, are regarded as the most eager partisans of the latest doctrines.

Scarcely giving himself time to remove his hat, he rushed eagerly into Prince Andrei's room, and, on the instant, rattled off into a stream of talk. He had only just learned the details of the session of the Imperial Council, that had taken place that morning, opened by the sovereign in person, and he began to tell about it with enthusiasm. The sovereign's speech had been extraordinary; it was such a speech as only a constitutional monarch could have uttered.

"The emperor said, in so many words, that the council and the senate were now the members of the government: he declared that the administration should have its basis, not on arbitrary will, but on firm principles. The sovereign declared that the finances should be re-organized, and the budgets made public," said Bitsky, laying a special emphasis on the important words, and opening his eyes significantly. "Yes, the event of today marks an era, a magnificent era, in our history," he said in conclusion.

Prince Andrei listened to the story of the opening of the Imperial Council, which he had been looking forward to with so much impatience, and to which he attributed so much importance; and he was amazed that this event, now that it was really accomplished, not only did not stir him, but even seemed to him worse than idle. He listened to Bitsky's enthusiastic account with quiet irony. The most obvious thought that came into his head was, "What concern is it to me or to Bitsky,—indeed, what concern is it of ours,—what the sovereign deigned to say in the council? Can it make me any happier, or any better?"

And this obvious criticism suddenly destroyed for Prince Andrei all the interest that he had formerly taken in the reforms.

Prince Andrei had been invited to dine that day at Speransky's, "en petit comité," as he himself expressed it when he gave him the invitation.

The idea of this dinner, in the intimate and home circle of a man for whom he felt such an admiration, had before this been exceedingly attractive to Prince Andrei, the more from the fact that hitherto he had never seen Speransky in his family life; but now he lost all desire to go.

At the hour set for the dinner, however, Prince Andreï reached Speransky's own small house, near the Tavrichesky Sad. Prince Andreï, a little late, was shown into the parquetry-floored dining-room of the modest little residence,—distinguished for its extraordinary, its rather monastic, primness,—where all the gentlemen constituting Speransky's petit comité, being his most intimate friends, had promptly assembled at five o'clock. There were no ladies present, except Speransky's young daughter, who had a long face just like her father's, and her governess. The guests were Gervais, Magnitsky, and Stoluiipin.

Even while Prince Andreï was in the anteroom, he heard loud voices, and a clear, precise ha-ha-ha: a laugh like that affected by actors on the stage. Some one, whose voice sounded like Speransky's, rang out distinctly: ha-ha-ha. Prince Andreï had never heard Speransky laugh heartily, and the clear, ringing laugh of the great statesman struck him strangely.

Prince Andreï went into the dining-room. All the company were standing between two windows, around a small table, spread with the zakuska. Speransky, in a gray coat, with a star, and wearing the same immaculate white waistcoat and high white stock in which he had appeared at the memorable meeting of the Imperial Council, stood at the table, his face beaming with pleasure. The gentlemen formed a circle around him. Magnitsky, addressing Mikhaïl Mikhaïlovitch, was relating an anecdote. Speransky listened, and began to laugh even before Magnitsky reached the point of his story. At the moment Prince Andreï entered the room, Magnitsky's words were drowned in another roar of merriment: Stoluiipin's deep voice rang out, as he nibbled a morsel of bread and cheese; Gervais bubbled over with tinkling laughter; and above all rang out Speransky's loud, deliberate ha-ha-ha.

Speransky, still laughing, gave his soft white hand to Prince Andreï.
"Very glad to see you, prince," said he. "One minute," .... said he, turning to Magnitsky, and interrupting the story he was telling. "We have an agreement today: dinner is for recreation, and not a word about business."

And again he turned to the narrator, and again broke out into laughter.

Prince Andrei, with surprise and sorrowful disillusionment, listened to his guffawing, and gazed at the hilarious Speransky. It seemed to Prince Andrei that it was not Speransky, but another man. All the mystery and charm that he had hitherto discovered in Speransky suddenly seemed commonplace and repulsive.

The conversation at the table did not flag for a moment, and seemed to consist of little more than a string of ludicrous stories. Magnitsky had scarcely time to cap the climax of his story, when some one else manifested his readiness to tell something that was even funnier. The anecdotes were for the most part, if not exactly confined to the world of officialdom, at least related to the individuals in the service. It seemed as if, in this gathering, the insignificance of such characters was so thoroughly taken for granted, that the only way in which it was worth while to speak of them was to cover them with good-natured ridicule.

Speransky related how at the council meeting that morning, one of the statesmen, who happened to be deaf, on being asked his opinion, replied that he was entirely agreeable. Gervais related a long incident in connection with the census, wherein remarkable stupidity had been shown by all persons concerned. Stoluiipin, who had an impediment in his speech, joined the conversation, and began with some heat to speak of the abuses of the former order of things; but, as this threatened to give a too serious character to the talk, Magnitsky chaffed him on his earnestness. Gervais made a pun, and again the talk assumed its former hilarious character.

Evidently Speransky, after his labors, liked recreation, liked to divert himself with a gay circle of friends; and all his guests, knowing this characteristic of his, did their best to make him enjoy himself, and at the same time to enjoy themselves. But this gayety seemed to Prince Andreï forced, and the opposite of gay. The ringing tones of Speransky's voice impressed him unpleasantly, and his incessant laughter had a false ring to it which strangely wounded his sensibilities. Prince Andreï could not laugh, and he was afraid that he should appear like a killjoy in the company. But no one noticed that he did not participate in the general merriment. All of them, it seemed, were extremely gay.

He tried several times to put in his word; but each time it was tossed back, as it were, like a cork tossed out of the water, and he could not jest like the others.

There was nothing wrong or ill-judged in what they said; wit and sense were displayed, and it ought to have been really worth laughing at, but something, the very thing that constitutes the salt of gayety, was lacking; but, worse than all, they did not seem to realize that it was.

After dinner, Speransky's little daughter, with her guvernantka, withdrew. Speransky caressed the little girl with his white hand, and kissed her. Even this action seemed to Prince Andreï full of affectation.

The gentlemen, after the English fashion, remained sitting at table over their port wine. The conversation had turned on Napoleon's management of affairs in Spain, and all were of one and the same mind in their approbation of it; but Prince Andreï took it on him to disagree with them. Speransky smiled, and, evidently wishing to change the subject, told a story which was totally irrelevant. Then silence ensued for several moments.

Before they left the table, Speransky recorked a bottle in which a little wine was left, and saying, "Good wine is expensive these days," 1 handed it to the servant, and got up.

All arose, and, still talking noisily, passed into the drawing-room. Speransky was handed two envelopes brought by a courier. He took them and went into his private room. As soon as he had left, the general gayety subsided, and the guests began to talk together in subdued tones on matters of real interest.

1 "Good wine goes in fine boots," a variant of a Russian proverb.

"Well, then, now for a recitation!" exclaimed Speransky, coming back from his private room. "Wonderful talent," he said, addressing Prince Andrei. Magnitsky immediately assumed an attitude, and began to recite some satirical verses which he had written in French on certain well-known personages in Petersburg, and several times he was interrupted by applause. At the end of this recitation, Prince Andrei went to Speransky to take leave.

"Where must you be going so early?" asked Speransky.

"I promised to spend the evening ...."

All were silent. Prince Andrei looked into Speransky's mirror-like and impenetrable eyes, and it seemed to him ridiculous that he had ever expected anything great from this Speransky, or of the work that he had undertaken to perform, or how he could ever have attributed any importance to what Speransky was doing. It was long before that dry, measured laugh of his ceased to ring in his ears, even after he had taken his leave of Speransky.

On his return home, Prince Andrei began to live over his life in Petersburg during the four months past, as if it were something new. He recalled his labors, his rounds of solicitation, the history of his project of the military code — which had been brought to notice, and then quietly laid on the table, for the sole reason that another one of very wretched character had already been compiled and placed before the sovereign; he recalled the meetings of his committee, of which Berg was a member; he recalled how strenuously and at what length everything that touched upon the outside forms and proceedings of their meetings had been discussed, and how careful they had been to avoid everything that reached the essence of the matter; he recalled his judicial labors, and what pains he had taken to translate articles on the Roman and French course of procedure into Russian; and he grew ashamed of himself.

Then his imagination vividly brought up before his mind his estate of Bogucharovo, his projects in the country, his journey to Riazan; he recalled his muzhiks, and their head man, Dron, and he applied to them his theory of the individual rights which he had so carefully elaborated into paragraphs; and he was amazed at himself that he could have wasted so much time in such idle work.

CHAPTER XIX

On the following day Prince Andrei went to make calls at several houses where he had not been as yet, and in the number at the Rostofs', whose acquaintance he had renewed at the last ball. Not only was he required by the laws of politeness to call at the Rostofs', but he also had a strong desire to see in her own home this original and lively young girl, of whom he had such pleasant recollections.

Natasha was the first who came down to see him. She wore a simple blue morning-dress, and it seemed to Prince Andrei that it was even more becoming to her than the one she had worn at the ball. She and the rest of the family received Prince Andrei simply and hospitably, as an old friend. The whole family, which he had at first been inclined to criticize severely, now seemed to him charming, simple-hearted, and cordial people. The old count showed such genuine and unbounded hospitality, and his good nature was so contagious, especially there in Petersburg, that Prince Andrei could not with good grace refuse his invitation to dinner.

"Yes, they are excellent people," said Bolkonsky to himself. "Of course they cannot appreciate what a treasure they possess in Natasha; but they are good, kindly people, and they make a most admirable background against which to bring out all the charm of this wonderfully poetical young girl, so overflowing with vivacity."

Prince Andrei felt that in Natasha existed a peculiar and unknown world, full of unrealized delights,—that unknown world of which he had caught the first glimpse as he drove through the Otradnoye avenue, and then again at the window that moonlight night, when he had been so stirred by it. Now this world no longer excited his curiosity, no longer was it a strange world; but, as he entered into it, he realized that new delight was awaiting him.

After dinner, Natasha, at the count's request, went to the clavichord and began to sing. Prince Andrei stood by the window and listened, occasionally exchanging words with the other ladies. In the middle of a phrase Prince Andrei stopped talking, and, to his amazement, found that he was choked with tears, a thing which he would not have believed possible for him. He looked at Natasha as she sang, and a new and joyous feeling arose in his heart. He was happy, and at the same time melancholy. He had really nothing to weep about, but he was ready to burst into tears. For what? his former love? ... For the little princess? ... For his disappointed illusions? ... For his hopes of the future? ... Yes and no! The chief reason that he felt like weeping was the sudden awakening to that strange and vivid contradiction between the boundlessly immense and infinite that existed in him, and the narrow and limited world to which he felt that he himself, and even she, belonged.

This contrast tormented and rejoiced him while she was singing.

As soon as Natasha finished her song, she went to him and asked him frankly how he liked her voice. She asked the question, and was overwhelmed with confusion the moment she had spoken, realizing, when it was too late, that she ought not to have asked it. He smiled as he looked at her, and replied that he liked her singing just as he liked everything else that she did.

It was late that evening before Prince Andrei left the Rostofs'. He went to bed as usual, but soon found that he had a sleepless night before him. Relighting his candle, he sat up in bed a little while; then he got up; then he lay down again; still, he was not in the least oppressed by this sleeplessness; his soul was so full of new and joyful sensations, that it seemed to him as if he had just emerged from a sultry chamber into God's free world. Nor did it once occur to him that he was in love with the young Countess Rostova; he did not think of her, he only imagined her himself; and the consequence of this was that all his whole life presented itself to him in a new light.

"Why am I struggling, why am I toiling and moiling in this narrow, petty environment, when life, all of life, with all its pleasures, is open before me?" he asked himself.

And for the first time for long months, he began to devise cheerful plans for the future. He decided that it was his duty to undertake personally the education of his son, to find him an instructor, and put him into his hands; then he would quit the service and travel abroad, and see England, Switzerland, and Italy.

"I must make the most of my freedom, since I feel myself so overflowing with strength and energy," said he to himself. "Pierre was right in saying that one ought to believe in the possibility of happiness, and now I believe it is so. Let the dead bury their dead; but, while we are alive, let us live," he thought.

CHAPTER XX

One morning, Colonel Adolph Berg, with whom Pierre was acquainted, just as he was acquainted with every one in Petersburg and Moscow, came to see him. He was dressed in an immaculate and brand-new uniform, with little pomaded love-locks curling round over his temples, just as the sovereign wore them.

"I have just come from calling on the countess, your wife, and I was so unfortunate in not being able to have my request granted! I hope, count, that I shall be more successful with you," said he, with a smile.

"What would you like, colonel? I am at your service."

"I am now quite completely settled in my new rooms, count," pursued Berg, evidently convinced in his own mind that this communication could not fail to be an agreeable piece of news. "And, consequently, I wanted to have a little reception for my friends and my wife's." He smiled more effusively than ever. "I wanted to ask the countess and yourself to do me the honor to come and take a cup of tea with us, and—and have supper."

Only the Countess Elena Vasilyevna, who considered the society of such people as the Bergs beneath her, could have had the heart to refuse such an invitation. Berg explained so clearly why he desired to gather around him a small and select company, and why it would be pleasant to him, and why he grudged money spent on cards, and other disreputable occupations, but was willing to go to large outlay in entertaining good company, that Pierre could not think of refusing, and agreed to be present.

"Only don't come late, count, if I may be so bold as to beg of you; at ten minutes to eight, I beg of you. We will have cards; our general will come,—he is very good to me. We will have a good supper, count. So please do me the favor."

Contrary to his usual habit of being late, Pierre that evening reached the Bergs' at quarter to eight, five minutes before the appointed time.

The Bergs, having made every provision for the reception, were all ready and waiting for their guests to come.

Berg and his wife were sitting together in their library, all new and bright, and well provided with statuary and paintings and new furniture. Berg, in a nice new uniform, tightly buttoned up, was sitting near his wife, explaining to her that it was always possible and proper to have acquaintances among people of high station, that being the only real advantage in having friends. "You can always find something to imitate, and can ask any sort of advice. You see, that's the way I have done ever since I was first promoted." — Berg did not reckon his life according to his years, but according to the various steps of promotion. — "My comrades are still of no account, but, at the first vacancy, I shall be made regimental commander; and then, I have the happiness of being your husband." He got up and kissed Viera's hand, but, before he did so, he straightened out the corner of a rug that was turned up. "And how have I accomplished all this? Principally, by exercising a choice in my acquaintances. Of course, though, one has to be straightforward and punctual."

Berg smiled with the consciousness of his superiority over a weak woman, and relapsed into silence, saying to himself that his wife, lovely as she was, was, nevertheless, a feeble woman, unable to appreciate the full significance of the dignity of being a man — ein Mann zu sein!

Viera, at the same time, smiled with a similar consciousness of her superiority over her good, worthy spouse; who, nevertheless, like the rest of his sex, was quite mistaken, she thought, in his understanding of the meaning of life.

Berg, judging by his wife, considered that all women were weak and unintellectual. Viera, judging by her husband alone, and making wider generalizations, supposed that all men considered no one but themselves wise, and at the same time had no real understanding, and were haughty and egotistical.

Berg got up, and, embracing his wife carefully, — so as not to rumple her lace pelerine, for which he had paid a high price, — kissed her on the center of the lips.

"There is one thing, — we must not begin to have children too soon," said he, by an unconscious correlation of ideas.

"Yes," replied Viera. "That's exactly what I do not want. We must live for society."

"The Princess Yusupovaya has one exactly like this,"

80  WAR AND PEACE
said Berg, laying his finger on the lace pelerine, with his honest, happy smile.

At this time Count Bezukhov was announced. The young couple exchanged congratulatory glances, each appropriating the honor of this visit.

"This is what comes of understanding how to form acquaintances," said Berg. "This comes of having tact!"

"Now, I beg of you, don't interrupt me when I am talking with guests," said Viera. "Because I know how to receive each one, and what to talk to them about."

Berg also smiled.

"Of course; but sometimes, among men, there must be conversation for men," said he.

Pierre was shown into the new drawing-room, where one could not possibly take a seat without destroying the symmetry, neatness, and order that reigned there; and, consequently, it was perfectly comprehensible and not to be wondered at that it required much magnanimity of Berg to allow this symmetry of chair or sofa to be disturbed for his beloved guest; or that, by reason of finding himself in a state of painful irresolution in regard to it, he should have allowed his guest to solve the problem in his own way. Pierre, accordingly, broke into the symmetry by pushing out a chair; and immediately after, Berg and Viera began their reception and began to talk, each interrupting the other, and trying to entertain their guest.

Viera, deciding in her own mind that Pierre would naturally be interested in the French embassy, immediately began to talk about it. Berg, deciding that a more virile subject must be chosen, broke into his wife's discourse by raising a question in regard to the war with Austria; and found himself involuntarily digressing from the abstract topic to various concrete proposals which had been laid before him in regard to taking part in the Austrian campaign, and the reasons which had led him to decline them.

Although the conversation was desultory, and Viera was indignant that this masculine element should have been introduced, both husband and wife had a feeling of satisfaction that, though as yet there was only one guest, still the evening had begun auspiciously, and that their reception was going to be like every other reception — with talk, tea, and brightly lighted candles — as like, in fact, as two drops of water.

Shortly after, Boris appeared, he having been Berg’s former comrade. He treated Berg and Viera with a shade of superiority and condescension. Boris was followed by a colonel and his lady, then Berg’s own general, then the Rostofs; and the reception by this time, without a shadow of a doubt, began to resemble all other receptions.

Berg and Viera could not refrain from a blissful smile at the sight of this stir in the drawing-room, at the clatter of disconnected snatches of conversation, at the rustle of silken gowns, and the greetings.

Everything was just as it would be everywhere else; especially so was the general, who could not find enough to say in praise of Berg’s apartments, and patted him on the shoulder, and with fatherly authority arranged the disposition of the tables for Boston. The general then set down next Count Ilya Andreyitch, as being, next to himself, the guest of the greatest importance. The old people gathered in groups by themselves, the young people by themselves; the hostess took her place at the tea-table, which was laid out with exactly the same kind of macaroons, in a silver cake-basket, as the Panins had had at their reception; in fact, everything was exactly the same as at all receptions.

CHAPTER XXI

Pierre, as one of the most distinguished guests of the evening, naturally had to play Boston in the set with Count Ilya Andreyitch, the general, and the colonel. It happened that his place at the table brought him opposite Natasha, and he could not help being struck by the strange change that had come over her since the evening of the ball. She spoke scarcely a word, and was not so pretty as she had been at the ball; indeed, she would have looked plain, if it had not been for her sweet expression of resignation.

“What is the matter with her?” Pierre wondered, as he looked at her. She was sitting next her sister at the tea-table, and, with an air of utter indifference and without even looking at him, answered some remark that Boris had made to her. Having played out a whole suit, and taken five tricks, greatly to his partner’s satisfaction, Pierre, as he gathered up his cards, was again led to look at her, by hearing complimentary greetings, and then the steps of some one entering the room.

“What has happened to her?” he asked himself, with even more wonder than before.

Prince Andreï, with an expression of protecting affection, was now standing in front of her, and saying something to her. She had lifted her head, and was gazing at him with flushed cheeks, and apparently striving to restrain her rapid breathing. And the brilliant light of a strange inner fire, till then suppressed, again flashed up in her. She was wholly transfigured: instead of being plain, she was as radiantly beautiful as she had been at the ball.

Prince Andreï came toward Pierre, and Pierre noticed a new and youthful expression in his friend’s face.

Pierre changed his seat several times during the game, sometimes being before Natasha, and sometimes behind; but, during all the time of the six “rubbers,” he kept watching her and his friend.

“There is something very serious going on between them,” said Pierre to himself; and a feeling of mingled joy and sadness stirred him, and made him forget his own grief.

After the sixth rubber the general got up, declaring that it was an impossibility to play in such a way, and Pierre regained his freedom. Natasha, on one side, was talking with Sonya and Boris; Viera, with a slight smile on her face, was talking to Prince Andreï about something or other.

Pierre joined his friend, and, asking what secret they were discussing together, took a seat near them. Viera, having noticed Prince Andreï's attention to Natasha, had decided that that evening, that very evening, it was an unavoidable necessity for her to drop some shrewd insinuations in regard to the feelings; and so she took advantage of a moment when Prince Andreï was alone to begin a talk about the sensibilities in general, and about her sister in particular. With such a clever man as she knew Prince Andreï to be, she knew she must here use her diplomatic arts.

When Pierre joined them, he noticed that Viera was talking with great eloquence and self-satisfaction, while Prince Andreï seemed rather confused, — which was a rare thing with him.

"What is your opinion?" asked Viera, with her slight smile. "You have such keen insight, prince, and are so quick to read people's characters: what do you think of Natalie? Would she be likely to be constant in her attachments? would she be like other women," — Viera had herself in mind, — "and love a man once, and remain forever faithful to him? That is what I call genuine love. What do you think, prince?"

"I have too slight an acquaintance with your sister," replied Prince Andreï, with a satirical smile, under which he tried to hide his confusion, "to decide such a delicate question; and then, I have noticed that the less attractive a woman is, the more likely she is to be constant," he added, and looked at Pierre, who had just at that instant joined them.

"Yes, that is true, prince; in our days," pursued Viera, — speaking of "our days" in a way affected by narrow-minded people who labor under the delusion that they are the only ones to discover and appreciate the peculiarities of their time, and that the human nature changes with the changing years, — "young girls have so much freedom, that the pleasure of being wooed — le plaisir d'être courtisée — often stifles their true feelings."
And Natalie, it must be confessed, is very susceptible to it."

This reference to Natasha again caused Prince Andrei to scowl disagreeably; he was about to rise, but Viera proceeded with a still more subtle smile:—

"I think no one has ever been more courtisée than she has," said Viera. "But no one had ever really seriously succeeded in pleasing her, until very recently. You must know, count," said she, addressing Pierre, "even our dear Cousin Boris has, between ourselves, gone very, very far into the land of sentiment."....

Prince Andrei, still scowling, said nothing.

"You and Boris are friends, are you not?" asked Viera.

"Yes, I know him."....

"I suppose he has told you about his boyish love for Natasha?"

"Ah! so it was a boyish love, was it?" suddenly asked Prince Andrei, unexpectedly reddening.

"Yes! You know sometimes this intimacy between cousins leads to love; cousinhood is a risky neighborhood! that's true, isn't it?"

"Oh, yes, without doubt," said Prince Andrei; and suddenly, becoming unnaturally excited, he began to rally Pierre on his duty to be on his guard against any intimacy with his fifty-year-old cousins in Moscow; and then, right in the midst of his jesting talk, he got up, and, taking Pierre by the arm, drew him aside.

"Well! what is it?" asked Pierre, amazed at his friend's strange excitement, and remarking the look which, as he got up, he threw in Natasha's direction.

"I must, I really must, have a talk with you," said Prince Andrei. "You know our gloves,"—he referred to the Masonic gloves, which a newly initiated brother was to present to the lady of his love. "I.... but no.... I will talk with you about it by and by." And, with a strange light in his eyes, and a restlessness in his motions, Prince Andrei crossed over to Natasha and sat down. Pierre saw how he asked her some question, and how she blushed as she answered him.
But just at that moment Berg came up to Pierre and urged him to take part in a discussion between the general and the colonel, on Spanish affairs.

Berg was satisfied and happy. Not once did the smile of pleasure fade from his face. The reception had been a success, and exactly like other receptions which he had attended. The parallelism was complete. The nice little gossipy chats among the ladies; the cards, and the general raising his voice over the game; the samovar and the macaroons! One thing only was lacking, which he had always seen at receptions, and which he wished to imitate: that was a loud conversation between the men, and a discussion over some grave and momentous question. The general had begun this conversation, and now Berg carried Pierre off to take part in it.

CHAPTER XXII

The next day, Prince Andrei went to the Rostofs' to dinner, in accordance with Count Ilya Andreyitch's invitation, and spent the whole evening there.

All in the house had an inkling of the reason of Prince Andrei's visits, and he made no secret of it, but tried to be in Natasha's company all the time.

Not only Natasha, in her heart of hearts frightened and yet blissful and full of enthusiasm, but all the household also, felt a sort of awe, in the anticipation of a great and solemn event. The countess, with melancholy and gravely wistful eyes, gazed at Prince Andrei as he talked with Natasha, and, with a sort of timidity, tried to introduce some indifferent topic as soon as he turned to her. Sonya was afraid to leave Natasha, and equally afraid that she was in their way, when she was with them. Natasha grew pale with fear and expectation if by chance she was left alone with him for a moment. Prince Andrei's timidity amazed her. She felt certain that he had something to say to her, but had not the courage to speak his mind.
In the evening, when Prince Andrei had taken his departure, the countess went to Natasha.

"Well?" said she, in a whisper.

"Mamma, for pity's sake, don't ask me any questions now. It is impossible to tell."

Nevertheless, that night, Natasha, at one moment full of excitement, at the next full of trepidation, lay for a long time in her mother's bed, with eyes fixed on space. Now she would tell her mother how he praised her, and how he said he was going abroad, and how he asked her where they were going to spend the summer, and how he had asked her about Boris.

"Well, it's so strange, so strange!... I never knew anything like it before," said she. "But I have such a feeling of terror when he is here; I always feel afraid when I am with him; what does it mean? Does it mean that it is really and truly....? Mamma, are you asleep?"

"No, dusha moya; I confess to the same feeling of terror," replied the mother. "Go, now!"

"I shan't go to sleep, all the same. How silly it would be to go to sleep! Mamasha, mamasha, nothing like it ever happened to me before," said she, in amazement and awe at the feeling which she was now experiencing. "How could we possibly have imagined...."

It seemed to Natasha that even as long ago as when Prince Andrei had come to Otradnoye, she had fallen in love with him. She was terror-stricken, as it were, at that strange, unexpected happiness in meeting again with the very man whom she had—as she persuaded herself—chosen for her husband then, and feeling that he was not indifferent to her.

"And it had to be that he should come to Petersburg just at the time when we were here; and it had to be that we should meet at that ball. It was our fate. It is evident that it was our fate, that it all led to this—all this. Even when I saw him first, I felt something peculiar."

"What is it he has said to you? What were those verses? Repeat them to me," said the countess, trying to recall some verses which Prince Andrei had written in Natasha's album.

"Mamma, it's nothing to be ashamed of because he is a widower, is it?"

"Don't talk nonsense, Natasha. Pray to God! Marriages are made in heaven!"

"Sweetheart! mamashka! how I love you, how good you are!" cried Natasha, shedding tears of bliss and emotion, and hugging her mother.

At that same time, Prince Andrei was at Pierre's, telling him about his love for Natasha, and his firm intention of marrying her.

That same evening, the Countess Elena Vasilyevna had given a rout. The French ambassador had been there; the foreign prince who for some time had been a frequent visitor at the countess's had been present; and a throng of brilliant ladies and gentlemen. Pierre had come down and wandered through the rooms, attracting general notice among the guests by his concentrated, distracted, and gloomy looks.

Pierre, ever since the time of the ball, had been conscious that attacks of his old enemy, hypochondria, were imminent; and, with the energy of despair, he had struggled to get the better of them. Since this prince had become the countess's acknowledged admirer, Pierre had unexpectedly been appointed one of the emperor's chamberlains; and from that time forth he began to feel a great burden and loathing in grand society, and more often his former gloomy, pessimistic thoughts, about the falsity of all things human, began to come back to him.

At this particular time, this tendency to gloominess was accentuated by the discovery of the sympathy existing between his little protegée Natasha and Prince Andrei, and by the contrast between his own position and his friend's. He vainly struggled to banish the thought about his wife, and about Natasha and Prince Andrei. But everything began once more to seem insignificant.
in comparison with eternity, and again the question arose, "To what end?"

Night and day he compelled himself to toil over his Masonic labors, hoping to exorcise the evil demon that hovered near him.

At midnight, Pierre came from the countess's apartments to his own low-studded room, which smelled of stale tobacco, and had just sat down at the table in his soiled khalat, and started to finish copying some original documents from Scotland, when some one came into the room.

It was Prince Andrei.

"Oh, it's you, is it?" said Pierre, in an abstracted and not-over-cordial manner.

"Here I am at work, you see," said he, pointing to his copy-book, and his face showed that he was trying to find in it salvation from his troubles. Unhappy folk always look at their work with that expression. Prince Andrei, his face radiant with enthusiasm and new life, came and stood in front of Pierre; and, not noticing his friend's unhappy face, smiled down on him with the egotism of happiness.

"Well, my dear," said he, "last evening I wanted to tell you something, and now I have come for that purpose. It is something wholly unprecedented in my experience. I am in love, my friend."

Pierre suddenly drew a deep sigh, and stretched his clumsy form out on the divan near Prince Andrei.

"With Natasha Rostova, I suppose?" said he.

"Yes, yes; who else could it be? I should never have believed it, but this feeling is stronger than I. Last evening I was tortured, I was miserable; but this torture I would not exchange for anything in the world. I have never lived till now. Only now do I live, and I cannot live without her. But can she love me?... I am too old for her. What should you say?"....

"I? I? What could I say?" suddenly exclaimed Pierre, springing up and beginning to pace the room.

"I have always thought.... This girl is such a treasure, such a.... she is a rare maiden.... my dear fellow: I be seech you, don't reason about it, don't let doubts arise, but marry her, marry her, marry her, .... and I am convinced that you will be the happiest man alive!"

"But how about her?"

"She loves you!"

"Don't talk nonsense...." said Prince Andreï, with a smile, and looking straight into Pierre's eyes.

"She loves you, I know she does," cried Pierre, bluntly.

"Now listen!" said Prince Andreï, holding him by his arm. "Do you know what a position I am in? I must tell some one all about it!"

"Well, well, go on, I am very glad," said Pierre, and in reality his face had changed; the frown had smoothed itself out, and he listened to Prince Andreï with joyous sympathy. Prince Andreï seemed, and really was, another and wholly new man. Where had vanished his melancholy, his contempt of life, all his disillusion? Pierre was the only man in whose presence he could speak with absolute frankness, and hence he poured out before him the fullness of his heart. Then he fluently and boldly made plans for the future, declaring that he could not think of sacrificing his happiness to his father's caprices, and expressing his hope that his father would consent to their marriage, and would come to love Natasha; then he expressed his amazement at the strange and uncontrollable feeling that dominated him.

"If any one had predicted the possibility of my being so deeply in love, I should not have believed it," said Prince Andreï. "It is an entirely different sentiment from the one that I had formerly. The whole world is divided for me into two portions: the one is where she is, and there all happiness and hope and light are found; the other is where she is not, and there everything is gloom and darkness." ....

"Darkness and gloom," repeated Pierre. "Yes, yes, and how I appreciate that!"

"I cannot help loving light, and I am not to blame for it. And I am very happy. Do you understand me? I know that you sympathize with my joy."
"Yes, indeed, I do," said Pierre, earnestly, gazing at his friend with tender, melancholy eyes. Prince Andrei's fate seemed to him all the brighter from the vivid contrast with the darkness of his own.

CHAPTER XXIII

Prince Andrei required his father's sanction for his marriage, and the next day he set out for his home.

The old prince received his son's communication with external unconcern, but with wrath in his heart. As his own life was nearing its close, he could not understand how any one could wish to make such a change in his life, to introduce into it such a new and unknown element.

"If only they would let me live out my life in my own way! then, when I am gone, they can do as they please," said the old man to himself. With his son, however, he made use of that diplomacy which he employed in matters of serious import. Assuming a tranquil tone, he summed the whole matter up:—

In the first place, the match was not brilliant, as to the birth, fortune, or distinction of the bride's family. In the second place, Prince Andrei was not as young as he had once been, and his health was feeble,—the old prince laid especial stress on this,—and she was very young. In the third place, he had a son, whom it would be a shame to give over to the mercy of a young stepmother.

"In the fourth place, finally," said the father, giving his son an ironical look, "I beg of you to postpone the affair for a year, go abroad, go through a course of treatment, find a good German tutor for Prince Nikolai; and then, if your love, passion, stubbornness, whatever you call it, is as strong as ever,—why, marry her. And this is my last word, remember; absolutely my last word," concluded the old prince, in a tone that signified that nothing could ever change his mind.

Prince Andrei clearly saw that the old prince hoped that either his sentiments or his prospective bride's might not withstand the test of a year, or else that he himself—since he was an old man—might die meantime; he, accordingly, determined to obey his father's wishes, to offer himself, and then postpone the wedding for a year.

Three weeks after his last call at the Rostofs', Prince Andrei returned to Petersburg.

The day following her confidential talk with her mother, Natasha waited anxiously for Bolkonsky; but he did not come. The second day, and the third day, it was precisely the same. Pierre, also, failed to come; and Natasha, not knowing that the prince had gone to see his father, could not explain his absence.

Thus passed three weeks. Natasha had no desire to go anywhere, and she wandered like a languid and mournful shadow through the rooms; evenings, she hid.
herself away from the others, and wept, and no longer came to her mother's bedchamber. She frequently flushed, and her temper grew peevish. She had an impression that everybody knew about her disapPOINTment, and was laughing at her and pitying her. This grief, born of pride, added to her misery, all the more from the fact that it was hidden grief.

One time she went to the countess, and tried to say something, but suddenly burst into tears. Her tears were like those of a child who has been punished without knowing for what reason.

The countess tried to calm her; but the young girl, though she at first began to listen, suddenly interrupted her:—

"Do stop, mamma; I do not understand and I cannot understand.... He came, and then he stopped coming.... he stopped coming...."

Her voice faltered, she almost wept; but she controlled herself and went on:—

"I have n't any desire at all to be married; and I have been afraid of him all the time: I'm perfectly content now, perfectly content."....
On the day following this conversation, Natasha put on an old gown for which she had an especially tender feeling, owing to the gay times which she had enjoyed when wearing it in days past; and from that morning she once more resumed the occupations that she had dropped since the time of the ball. After she had drunk her tea, she went into the ball-room, which she liked on account of its powerful resonance, and began to practise her solfeggios and other exercises. After she had finished her lesson, she stood in the middle of the room and repeated a single musical phrase which pleased her more than others. She joyfully listened to the charming and apparently unexpected way in which these notes reverberated through the empty spaces of the ball-room, and slowly died away; and suddenly her heart grew lighter.

"What is the use of thinking so much about it all! it is good as it is," said she to herself, and she began to pace up and down the room, not content with simply walking along the echoing inlaid floor, but at every step — she wore her favorite new slippers — setting her little heels down first, and then her toes, and finding as much enjoyment in the regular clapping of the heel and the creaking of the toe, as in the sounds of her voice. As she passed by a mirror, she glanced into it.

'What a girl I am!' the expression of her face, as she caught sight of the reflection in the glass, seemed to say. 'It's all good! I need no one.'

A lackey was on the point of coming in to make some arrangements in the ball-room; but she sent him away, closing the door after him, and then continued her walk. Now again, this morning, she resumed her former favorite habit of loving and admiring her own sweet self.

"How charming this Natasha is!" she was saying, as if the words were spoken by some third person, the man of her imagination. "Pretty, a good voice, young, and she does not interfere with any one; only leave her in peace!"

But even if she had been left in peace, she could not have been calm; and of this she was immediately made aware.

The front door into the vestibule was opened, and some one asked:—

"Are they at home?" and then a man's steps were heard. Natasha was gazing into the mirror, but she did not see herself. She heard voices in the vestibule. When she looked in the mirror again her face was pale.

It was he! She was sure of it, though she could barely distinguish the voices through the closed doors.

Pale and frightened, Natasha ran into the drawing-room.

"Mamma, Bolkonsky has come," she cried. "Mamma! this is dreadful! this is unendurable! I will not be.... tortured so! What shall I do?"....

Before the countess had time to answer her, Prince Andrei, with a grave and anxious face, was shown in. As soon as he caught sight of Natasha, a flash of joy lighted it. He kissed the countess's hand, and Natasha's, and took a seat near the divan.

"It is a long time since we have had the pleasure...." the countess began to say, but Prince Andrei interrupted her. He answered her implied question, and was evidently anxious to speak what was on his mind as soon as possible.

"I have not been to see you all this time, for the reason that I went to see my father; I had to confer with him regarding a very important matter. I returned only yesterday evening," he said, glancing at Natasha. "I should like to have a little conversation with you, countess," he added, after a moment's silence.

The countess, drawing a long sigh, dropped her eyes.

"I am at your service," she murmured.

Natasha knew that it was her duty to leave the room, but she found it impossible to stir; something choked her, and she stared at Prince Andrei, almost rudely, with wide eyes.

"What! so soon? this very moment?.... No, it cannot be!" she said to herself.
He again looked at her, and this glance told her that beyond a peradventure she was not deceived.
Yes, her fate was to be decided instantly, that moment, then and there!
"Go, Natasha, I will send for you," whispered the countess.

Natasha, with startled, pleading eyes, looked at her mother, and at Prince Andrei, and left the room.

"I have come, countess, to ask your daughter's hand," said Prince Andrei.

The countess's face flushed, but she said nothing.

"Your proposal...." began the countess, gravely. Prince Andrei waited, and looked into her eyes. "Your proposal"—she grew confused—"is very pleasing to us, and.... and I accept, accept your proposal, with pleasure. And my husband.... I hope.... but it will depend upon herself."

"I will ask her as soon as I receive your permission .... will you grant it?" said Prince Andrei.

"Yes," said the countess, and she offered him her hand; and, with a mixed feeling of alienation and affection, touched his brow with her lips, as he bent over her hand. She was ready to love him as a son; but she was conscious that he held her at a distance, and filled her with a sort of terror. "I am sure that my husband will give his consent," said the countess; "but your father...."

"My father, to whom I have confided my plans, has consented, on the express stipulation that the wedding should not take place within a year; and this was the very thing that I wished to tell you," said Prince Andrei.

"It is true that Natasha is still young, but a year is so long."

"This cannot be otherwise," said Prince Andrei, with a sigh.

"I will send her to you," said the countess, and she left the room.

"Lord, have mercy upon us!" she repeated over and over, as she went in search of her daughter. Sonya said that Natasha was in her chamber. She found her sitting on her bed, pale, with dry eyes, gazing at the holy pictures, and swiftly crossing herself, and whispering to herself. When she saw her mother, she jumped up and rushed to her.

"What? Mamma?.... What is it?"

"Go, go to him. He has proposed for your hand," said the countess, coldly, so it seemed to Natasha. "Go!.... Go," reiterated the mother, drawing a long sigh, and looking with melancholy, reproachful eyes after her daughter, as she flew out of the room.

Natasha could not remember how she found herself in the drawing-room. But, as she went into the room, and caught sight of him, she stopped short.

"Can it be that this stranger is now all in all to me?" she asked herself; and the reply came like a flash, "Yes! he alone is dearer to me than all in the world."

Prince Andrei went to her with downcast eyes:

"I have loved you from the first moment that I saw you. May I dare to hope?"

He looked at her, and the grave passion expressed in his face filled her with wonder.

Her eyes replied, "Why should you ask? Why should you doubt what you must surely know? Why should you speak, when it is impossible with words to express what you feel?"

She drew near to him, and paused. He took her hand, and kissed it: "Do you love me?"

"Yes, yes," exclaimed Natasha, with something that seemed almost like vexation; and, catching her breath more and more frequently, she began to sob.

"What is it? What is the matter?"

"Akh! I am so happy," she replied, smiling through her tears, and coming closer to him; she hesitated for a moment, as if asking if it were permissible, and then kissed him.

Prince Andrei held her hand, and gazed into her eyes, and failed to find in his heart his former love for her. A sudden transformation seemed to have taken place in his soul: there was none of that former poetical and mysterious charm of longing; but there was a feeling akin to pity for her weakness, as a woman, as a child; there was a shade of fear, in presence of her utter self-renunciation, and her fearless honesty; a solemn and, at the same time, blissful consciousness of the obligation which forever bound him to her. The present feeling, though it was not so bright and poetical as the former, was more deep and powerful.

"Has your maman told you that our marriage cannot be till a year has passed?" asked Prince Andrei, continuing to gaze into her eyes.

"Can it be that this is the little silly chit of a girl, as they all say of me?" mused Natasha. "Can it be that from this time forth, I am the wife, the equal, of this stranger, this gentle, learned man, whom even my father regards with admiration? Can it be true, can it be true that now, henceforth, life has become serious? that now I am grown up? that now I shall be responsible for every word and deed?.... Yes, but what was that he asked me?"

"No," said she aloud; but she did not know what he had asked her.

"Forgive me," said Prince Andrei. "But you are so young, and I have already had such long experience of life. I tremble for you. You do not know yourself!"

Natasha, with concentrated attention, listened to what he said, and did her best to take in the full meaning of his words; but it was impossible.

"How hard this year will be for me—deferring my happiness!" pursued Prince Andrei. "But during the time you will have made sure of your own heart. At the end of the year I shall ask you to make me happy; but you are free. Our betrothal shall remain a secret, and if you should discover that you do not love me, if you should love...." said Prince Andrei, with a forced and unnatural smile.

"Why do you say that?" asked Natasha, interrupting him. "You know that from that very first day that you came to Otradnoye, I loved you," said she, firmly convinced that she was telling the truth.
"In a year, you will have learned to know yourself."

"A who....ole year!" suddenly exclaimed Natasha, it now suddenly, for the first time, dawning upon her that the wedding was to be postponed. "And why a year?—why a year?"

Prince Andreï began to explain the reasons for this postponement. Natasha refused to listen to him.

"And is there no other way of doing?" she asked. Prince Andreï made no answer, but the expression of his face told her how unalterable his decision was.

"This is terrible! No, this is terrible, terrible!" suddenly exclaimed Natasha, and again she began to sob. "I shall die, if I have to wait a year; it cannot be, it is dreadful."

She looked into her lover's face, and saw that it was full of sympathy and perplexity.

"No, no, I will do everything you wish," she said, suddenly ceasing to sob. "I am so happy."

Her father and mother came into the room, and congratulated the affianced pair.

From that day forth, Prince Andreï began to visit the Rostofs as Natasha's accepted husband.

CHAPTER XXIV

There was no formal betrothal, and Bolkonsky's engagement to Natasha was not made public. Prince Andreï insisted on this point. He said that, as he was the cause of the postponement, he ought to bear the whole burden of it. He declared that he considered himself forever bound by his word; but he felt that he ought not to hold Natasha, and he granted her perfect freedom. If, within a half-year, she should discover that she did not love him, she should have perfect right to break the engagement.

Of course, neither the parents nor Natasha would hear to this, but Prince Andreï pressed the matter. Prince Andreï was at the Rostofs' every day, but he did not treat Natasha with the familiarity of the zhenikh, or bridegroom: he always addressed her by the formal vui, "you," and kissed only her hand.

Between Prince Andrei and Natasha, after the day of their betrothal, there came to be an entirely different relationship from before: one closer and more simple. It seemed as if they hitherto had never known each other; both of them liked to recall how they had seemed at the time when they were nothing to each other; now they both felt that they were entirely different beings; then everything was pretense, now it was simple and true. At first the family felt a certain awkwardness in their relations toward Prince Andrei: he seemed like a man from another world, and it took Natasha a long time to train the others to feel used to him; and she felt a pride in assuring them all that it was only in appearance that Prince Andrei was so different, and that he was really like every one else, and that she was not afraid of him, and that no one had any reason to fear him.

After some days the family got wonted to him, and felt no awkwardness in going on in his presence with the ordinary routine of life, and he also had a share in it. He could talk with the count about farming, with the countess and Natasha about wearing-apparel, and with Sonya about albums and embroidery. Sometimes the family, when by themselves, and even in Prince Andrei's presence, marveled that such an event had taken place,—that the prognostics of it had been so apparent: thus, Prince Andrei's visit to Otradnoye, and their coming to Petersburg, and the resemblance between Natasha and Prince Andrei, which an old nurse had remarked when he first came to Otradnoye, and many other portents of what had happened, were recalled by the family.

That poetical melancholy and silence which always mark the presence of an engaged couple reigned in the house. Often, when all were together, no word would be said. Sometimes the rest would get up and leave the room, and even then the two young people, though by themselves, would sit in perfect silence, as before. They rarely spoke about their future; Prince Andrei avoided it from dread, as well as from conscientious motives. Natasha shared his feelings, as, indeed, she shared all his feelings, which she was always quick to read.

Once, Natasha began to ask him about his little boy; Prince Andrei flushed, as he was apt to do at that time,—and Natasha particularly liked it in him,—and replied that his son would not live with them.

"Why not?" asked Natasha, in alarm.

"I could not take him away from his grandfather; and, besides...."

"How I should love him!" exclaimed Natasha, instantly divining his thought. "But I understand: you are anxious to avoid any excuse for misunderstandings between us."

The old count sometimes came to Prince Andrei, kissed him, and asked him his advice in regard to Petya's education, or Nikolai's advancement in the army. The old countess would sigh as she looked at them. Sonya was always afraid that she was in the way, and tried to invent excuses for leaving them alone, even when this was not necessary. When Prince Andrei talked—and he was very admirable in conversation—Natasha would listen to him with pride; when she herself spoke, she noticed, with fear and joy, that he listened to her with attention, and scrutinized her keenly. She would ask herself in perplexity:

"What is he searching for in me? What are his eyes trying to discover? Supposing he were not to find in me what he seeks to find?"

Occasionally she was attacked by one of those absurd fits of mirth, peculiar to her, and then it was a delight for her to see and hear him laugh. He rarely laughed aloud, but when he did indulge in merriment, he gave himself up entirely to it; and always, after such an experience, she felt that she had grown nearer to him. Natasha would have been perfectly happy, if the thought of their parting, which was now near at hand, had not filled her with vague alarm,—so much so that she grew pale and chill at the mere thought of it.

On the evening before his departure from Petersburg, Prince Andrei brought Pierre, who had not once called at the Rostofs' since the evening of the ball. Pierre seemed confused and out of spirits. He engaged in conversation with the countess. Natasha was sitting with Sonya at the checker-table and asked Prince Andrei to join them. He did so.

"You have known Bezukhov for a long time, have you not?" he asked. "Do you like him?"

"Yes, he is a splendid man, but very absurd."

And, as was usually the case, when speaking of Pierre, she began to relate anecdotes of his heedlessness, anecdotes, many of which had been invented about him.

"You know, I have told him our secret," said Prince Andrei. "I have known him since we were boys. His heart is true gold. I beg of you, Natalie," said he, growing suddenly grave. "I am going away. God knows what may happen: you may cease to lo.... well, I know that I ought not to speak of this. One thing, though: in case anything should happen, after I am gone...."

"What could happen?"

"If there should be any misfortune," pursued Prince Andrei, "I beg you, Mademoiselle Sophie, if anything should happen, go to him for help and counsel. He may be a most heedless and absurd man, but his heart is the truest gold."

Not Natasha's father, or mother, or Sonya, or Prince Andrei himself, could have foreseen what an effect parting from her lover would have had upon Natasha. Flushed and excited, with burning eyes, she wandered all day long up and down the house, busying herself with the most insignificant things, as if she had no idea of what was going to happen. She did not shed a tear, even at the moment when he kissed her hand for the last time, and bade her farewell.

"Don't leave me," was all that she said; but these words were spoken in a voice which caused him to pause and consider whether it was really necessary for him to go away, and which he remembered long afterward.

Even after he had gone, she did not weep; but she stayed in her room for many days, not shedding a tear, and she took no interest in anything, and only said from time to time:—

"Akh! why did he go?"

But, a fortnight after his departure, most unexpectedly to the household, she woke up out of this moral illness, and began to seem the same as formerly; except that her whole moral nature was changed, just as the faces of children change during protracted illness.

CHAPTER XXV

Prince Nikolai Andreyitch Bolkonsky's health and disposition grew much worse during the year that followed his son's absence. He became even more irritable than formerly; and all the explosions of his unreasonable anger were turned against the Princess Mariya. It seemed as if he tried to search out all the tender spots of her nature, so as to torture her as grievously as possible.

The Princess Mariya had two passions, and, therefore, two joys: her little nephew, Nikolushka, and religion; and both were favorite themes for the old prince's slurs and ridicule. Whatever subject of conversation arose, he managed to bring in some reference to old maids' superstitions, or to the spoiling and over-indulging of children.

"Do you wish to make him" — he referred to Nikolushka — "an old maid, like yourself? It's all nonsense; Prince Andrei wants a son — not a girl," said he.

Or, turning to Mlle. Bourienne, he would ask her, in the princess's presence, how she liked our Russian popes and images, and again indulge in his bitter jests.

He seized every opportunity of cruelly wounding the Princess Mariya, but his daughter found no difficulty in forgiving him. How could she blame him, and how could he, her father, who she knew, in spite of all, loved her, be unjust to her? Yes, and what was justice? The princess never thought about that word “justice”—a concept born of pride. All the complicated laws of men, for her, were summed up in the one clear and simple rule of love and self-denial, imposed upon us by Him, who, though he was God, so loved the world as to suffer for it. What mattered to her, then, the justice or injustice of men? It was necessary for her to suffer and to love, and this she did.

During the winter, Prince Andrei had come to Luisiya Gorui, and was more cheerful, gentle, and affectionate than the Princess Mariya had seen him for a long time. She had a presentiment that something unusual had happened to him; but he said nothing to her about his love. Before he went away, he was closeted for a long time with his father, and the Princess Mariya noticed that each was displeased with the other.

Shortly after Prince Andrei’s departure, the Princess Mariya wrote to her friend, Julie Karagina, who was at that time in Petersburg, and in mourning for her brother, who had been killed in Turkey. Like all young girls, the Princess Mariya had her dreams; and one of hers was that Julie would yet become her brother’s wife.

Affliction, my dear and affectionate friend Julie, is evidently the common lot of us all.

Your loss is so awful that I can only explain it as being a special providence of God, who, in his love for you, has seen fit to try you and your excellent mother. Ah! my dear friend, religion, and religion alone, can—I will not say console us—but save us from despair; religion alone can make plain to us what, without her aid, it is impossible for man to comprehend: why, for what purpose, should beings who are good and noble, and best made to find happiness in life, who have not only never injured a living thing, but rather have sought only the happiness of others,—why should they be recalled to God; while the base and the vicious, or those who are only a burden to themselves and others, are left to live?

The first death which I ever witnessed—and I shall never forget it—was that of my dear sister-in-law, and it produced upon me a wonderful impression. Just as you are now asking Fate why your charming brother had to die, so did I ask why this angelic Liza should be taken away, when she had never done the slightest wrong to any one, and never had anything but the purest thoughts in her soul. And since then, my dear friend, five years have passed away, and, even with my humble intelligence, I begin clearly to see why she had to die, and how her death may be regarded as merely the expression of the Creator's infinite goodness, all of Whose works, though for the most part beyond our comprehension, are but the manifestation of His boundless love to His creatures.

I often think so, and perhaps her purity was too angelic to be compatible with the force necessary to carry all the obligations of motherhood. As a young wife, she was beyond reproach; possibly she might have failed as a mother. Now, although she has left us, and Prince Andreï in particular, the purest regret and sweetest memories, I am sure that she herself is in the enjoyment of that place which I dare not hope for myself to attain.

But, not to speak of her exclusively, this premature and terrible death has had a most salutary effect, notwithstanding all the sorrowfulness of it, on my brother and myself.

These thoughts at that time would have been impossible,— at that time I should have repelled them with horror; but now this is plain, and beyond a peradventure. I write this to you, my friend, simply hoping that it may persuade you of the Gospel truth, which I have taken as the rule of my whole life: that not one hair from our head shall fall without His will. And His will is conditioned only by infinite love toward us; and, therefore, all that happens to us is for our good.

You ask if we are going to spend next winter in Moscow? In spite of all my desire to see you, I think it most improbable; and, indeed, I cannot think that it is for the best. And you will be amazed when I tell you that the reason of that is — Buonaparte!
And this is why: my father's health has been failing of late; he cannot endure any contradiction, and has grown irritable. This irritability, as you may know, is especially excited by political affairs. He cannot endure the thought that Buonaparte has so managed as to put himself on an equality with all the sovereigns of Europe, and especially with ours — the grandson of the great Catherine! As you know, I am perfectly indifferent to politics; but from words spoken by my father, and from his discussions with Mikhail Ivanovitch, I know all that is going on in the world, and particularly about all the honors attained by Buonaparte, who, I should think, is considered a great man, and not the least of the French emperors, all over the world, except at Luisiya Gorui!

And this is what my father will not admit! It seems to me that my father, precisely on account of his views of political affairs, and foreseeing the collisions which would infallibly take place, in consequence of his character,—taking no account of any one when he expresses his opinions,—feels unwilling to go to Moscow. All the gain that he would get, he would more than undo by the quarrels which would be sure to follow in regard to Buonaparte. At all events, the question is soon to be decided.

Our home life goes on in the old routine, except that my brother Andrei is away. As I have already written you, he has been very much changed of late. This year, for the first time since his affliction, he has begun to lead a perfectly normal life; he has become what he was when he was a child, as I remember him, kind, affectionate, and with a truly golden heart, the like of which I never knew. He has learned, so it seems to me, that his life, after all, is not yet ended. But, together with this moral change, his physical health has deteriorated. He is far worse than before, more nervous. I am troubled about him, and I am glad that he has decided to take the trip abroad which the doctor long ago prescribed for him. I hope that it will effect a complete cure.

You write me that he is spoken of in Petersburg as one of the most industrious, cultivated, and intelligent young men of the day. Forgive a sister's pride, but I have never doubted it. It is impossible to estimate the good which he has accomplished here, beginning with his own peasantry, and including the nobility of the district. In his life at Petersburg he has received only what was due him.

I am amazed that rumors should have come from Petersburg to Moscow, and especially such false rumors as what you wrote me in regard to the supposed marriage of my brother to the little Rostova. I do not believe that my brother will ever marry again; and certainly he will not marry her. And this is my reason for thinking so: in the first place, I know that, though he rarely mentions his late wife, yet he was too deeply afflicted by her loss ever to think of letting another fill her place in his heart, or of giving a stepmother to our little angel. In the second place, to the best of my knowledge, this young girl is not the sort of woman who would be likely to please Prince Andreï. I feel certain that he would not choose her for his wife, and I will frankly confess that I do not desire it.

But I have prattled too long, already: here I am, finishing my second sheet! Good-by, my dear friend. May God shield you under His holy and almighty wing. My dear companion, Mlle. Bourienne, sends her love.

MARIE.

CHAPTER XXVI

In the middle of the summer, the Princess Mariya received a letter from her brother, from Switzerland, in which he confided the strange and surprising news of his engagement to Natasha. His whole letter breathed enthusiastic devotion for his "bride," and affectionate and trusting love for his sister. He wrote that he had never before loved as he loved now, and that now only did he realize and understand the meaning of life; he besought his sister to pardon him for not having said anything to her about this at his visit at Luisiya Góru, although he had confided his intention to his father.

He had not told her because the Princess Mariya would have endeavored to persuade their father to grant his request; and if she had failed, it would have irritated him, and the whole weight of his displeasure would have come upon her.

Moreover [he wrote], the matter was not so definitely settled as it is now. Then, my father had set a term of probation—a year; and now, already, six months have slipped away, half of the designated term, and I remain firmer than ever fixed in my determination. If the doctors had not detained me here at the springs, I should have been back in Russia ere this; but now I must postpone my return for three months longer. You know me, and how I am situated in regard to my father: I really need nothing from him; I have been, and shall be always, independent of him; but to act contrary to his wishes, to incur his anger, when perhaps he has so short a time to remain among us, would destroy half of my happiness. I have just been writing him a letter in regard to this, and I beg of you, if you can find a favorable moment, give him this letter, and inform me how he receives it, and whether there is any hope that he will consent to shorten the term by three months.

After a long period of indecision, doubting, and prayer, the princess handed the letter to her father. The day following, the old prince said to her, without any show of excitement:

"Write to your brother to wait till I'm dead.... it won't be long.... he'll soon be free."....

The princess tried to make some reply; but her father would not hear to it, and his voice began to rise higher and higher.

"Marry, marry, my little dove!.... Fine family!.... Clever people, ha? Rich? ha! Yes, a fine stepmother for the little Nikolushka she'll make. Write him that he may marry her to-morrow, if he wishes. She'll make a fine stepmother for Nikolushka, and I'll marry Bourienka! Ha! ha! ha! so that he may have a stepmother as well! There's one thing, though, there's no room for any more women here; let him marry, and go and live by himself. Perhaps you'd like to go and live with him?" said he, turning to the Princess Mariya: "Go, then, in God's name: through ice and snow — ice and snow — ice and snow!"

After this explosion, the old prince said nothing more on that score, but his restrained vexation at his son's weakness was expressed in his treatment of his daughter. And he now had new themes for his sarcasm, in addition to his old ones; namely, stepmothers, and his admiration for Mlle. Bourienne.

"Why should I not marry her?" he asked his daughter.

"She would make a splendid princess!"

And the Princess Mariya began to notice, with perplexity and amazement, that her father more and more tried to have the Frenchwoman about him as much as possible. The Princess Mariya wrote Prince Andrei how their father had received his letter; but she tried to comfort her brother, giving him to hope that her father might be dissuaded from this notion.

Nikolushka and his education, Andreï, and religion were the Princess Mariya's consolation and delight; but, as every human being must cherish some individual aspiration, so also the Princess Mariya had, in the deep-est depths of her soul, secret dreams and hopes, which constituted a higher consolation even than the others. This consoling dream and hope was represented to her mind by the "Men of God," the pilgrims and fanatics who came to see her without the old prince's knowledge.

The longer the Princess Mariya lived, and the more experience she got out of life, by carefully observing it, the more she marveled at the short-sightedness of men who seek here on earth all their enjoyment and delight; who toil and moil, and battle and struggle, and do evil to one another, in order to follow these impossible, shame-ful phantoms of happiness. Prince Andreï loved his wife; she died: he was all ready to find his happiness in another woman. His father objected to this, because he desired for his son a more distinguished and wealthy alliance. And thus all men struggled, and suffered, and tortured themselves, and risked the loss of their souls, their immortal souls, for the sake of attaining joys which were merely transitory.

"Not only do we know this ourselves, but Christ, the son of God, came down to earth and taught us that this life is fleeting, a short probation; and yet we cling to it always, and expect to find happiness in it. How is it that no one comprehends this?" wondered the Princess Mariya. "None except these despised Men of God, who come to me with wallets on their shoulders, climbing the backstairs, for fear they should meet the prince, not to avoid suffering, but for the sake of preventing him from committing a sin. To forsake family and fatherland, and forswear all endeavor to get earthly good; to form no ties, and to wander under an assumed name, in hempen rags, from place to place, doing no harm to any one, and praying for people, praying for those who persecute them, as well as for those who give them protection,—there is no truth, and no life, higher than that!"

There was one pilgrim woman, Fedosyushka,—a little, gentle, pock-marked woman, fifty years old,—who had been for thirty years wandering about the world barefooted and wearing penitential chains. The Princess Mariya was especially fond of her. Once, in the solitude of her chamber, feebly illumined only by the lampadka or shrine lamp, when Fedosyushka had been telling about her experiences, the thought that the pilgrim woman had found the only true path of life suddenly came over her with such appealing force that she herself resolved to go on a pilgrimage. After Fedosyushka had retired to rest, the Princess Mariya long pondered the matter in her own mind, and at last resolved, no matter how unusual it was, that it was her duty to make this pilgrimage. She confided her resolve only to the monk, Father Akinfidja, her confessor, and the confessor approved of her project. Under the pretext that she was going to help some pilgrim, the Princess Mariya sent and purchased a pilgrim’s complete outfit: shirt, lapti, or bast shoes, a kaftan, and a black kerchief. Frequently she would go to the curtained commode where she kept them, and stand irresolute, wondering whether the time had not yet come for her to carry out her project.

Often, when she heard the stories told by the pilgrims, she would be stirred by their simple narratives, which to her were full of profound meaning, though so mechanically repeated by them; till, oftentimes, she was ready to renounce everything and flee from her home. In her imagination she already saw herself and Fedosyushka, in filthy rags, tramping along with staff and birch-bark wallet, over the dusty highway, rambling about from one saint’s shrine to another; without envy, without the love of her fellows, without desires; and, at the end of all, journeying thither where there is no regret and no tears, but eternal joy and felicity.

"I shall go to a place where there is a saint; I shall pray there; but, before I get attached to the place, or love any one, I shall pass on. And I shall keep wandering on until my limbs fail under me, and then I shall lie down and die anywhere; and then, at last, I shall reach that eternal haven of peace where there is no regret and no sorrow!” said the Princess Mariya to herself.

But later, when she saw her father, and especially the little Koko, her resolve lost its force; she shed a few quiet tears, and had the consciousness that she was a sinner: she loved her father and her nephew more than God.
PART SEVENTH

CHAPTER I

THE biblical tradition tells us that absence of work, idleness, constituted the first man's happiness before the fall. A love for idleness remains just the same, even in fallen man; but the curse still hangs over mankind, and it is impossible for us to be slothful and easy-going; not alone because we are required to earn our bread in the sweat of our faces, but because by the very conditions of our moral nature we cannot be idle and content. A secret voice warns us that to be idle is for us a sin. If a man could find a situation where he could feel that he was of use in the world, and fulfilling his duty while still remaining idle, he would have found one of the conditions of primeval bliss. And such a condition of obligatory and irreproachable idleness is enjoyed by a whole class of society—the military. And this state of obligatory and irreproachable idleness always has been and will be the chief attraction of military service.

Nikolai Rostof had been enjoying this felicity to the full, having continued since 1807 to serve in the Pavlovgrad regiment; he was now commander of the squadron of which Denisof had been deprived. Rostof had grown into a rather rough but kindly young fellow, whom his Moscow acquaintances would have found sufficiently mauvais genre, but who was loved and respected by his comrades, his subordinates as well as his superiors; and he was well satisfied with his existence. Latterly, in 1809, in letters from home, he had found more and more frequent complaints from his mother that their pecuniary affairs were going from bad to worse, and that it would be seasonable for him to come home and give his old parents some joy and consolation.

In reading over these letters, Nikolai felt a sensation of alarm at the thought of being torn from a condition of life where he found himself so quiet and tranquil, far removed from the busy turmoil of society. He had a presentiment that, sooner or later, he should be dragged again into that whirlpool of life,—with its wasteful expenditure, and rearrangement of affairs; with its accounts to verify; with its quarrels, intrigues, obligations; with the demands of society, and with Sonya's love, and the necessity of an explanation. All this was terribly difficult and confused; and he answered his mother's letters with cold formality, beginning, Ma chère maman, and concluding with Votre obéissant fils, and studiously refrained from setting any time for his return home.

In 1810 he received a letter from his parents, who informed him of the engagement between Natasha and Bolkonsky, and that the wedding was put off for a year, on account of the old prince refusing his sanction. This news grieved and disgusted Nikolai. In the first place he was pained at the thought of losing Natasha from the household, for he was fonder of her than the other members of the family; in the second place, he was annoyed, from his point of view as a hussar, that he had not been on hand to make this Bolkonsky understand that this alliance was not a very great honor, and that, if he loved Natasha, he might have married her, even without his scatter-brained father's consent.

For a moment he almost made up his mind to ask for leave of absence, so as to see Natasha before she was married; but just then came the army manoeuvres, he remembered Sonya and the various entanglements, and once more he postponed it.

But in the spring of that same year he received a letter from his mother, who wrote without the count's knowledge, and this letter prompted him to go. She wrote that if he did not come, and did not assume the management of their affairs, their whole property would have to be sold by auction, and they would all be thrown on the world. The count was so weak, he had such confidence in Mitenka, he was so good-natured and so easily cheated by every one, that everything was going from bad to worse. "For God's sake, I beg of you, come immediately, unless you wish to make me and all the family unhappy," wrote the countess.

This letter had its effect upon Nikolai. He was possessed of the sound common sense of mediocrity, and it told him that this was his duty.

Now, it was requisite that he should go either on leave of absence or on the retired list. He could not have explained why he had to go, but, after his siesta, he commanded his roan stallion Mars to be saddled— it had not been out for a long time, and was at any time a terribly fiery steed; and, when he brought it home all in a lather, he explained to Lavrushka,—Denisof's man had stayed on with Rostof,—and to his comrades who dropped in that afternoon, that he had obtained leave of absence, and was going home.

How hard it was for him to realize that he was going to absent himself from army life— the only thing that especially interested him—and fail to find whether he had been promoted, or granted the "Anna," for the last manoeuvres! How strange it was to think that he was going away before he had sold that troïka, or three-span, of roans to the Polish Count Holuchowski, which they had been negotiating about, and which Rostof had wagered would bring two thousand rubles! How impossible to realize that he should miss the ball which the hussars were going to give to the Pani Pscazdecска, in order to pique the Uhlans, who had given a ball to their Pani Borzjozowska! He knew that he must leave, go away from all this bright, pleasant existence, and go where everything was trouble and turmoil.

At the end of a week he was granted his leave of absence. His comrades of the hussars, not only those of his regiment, but of the whole brigade, gave him a dinner which cost them fifteen rubles a head; they had two bands to play, and two choruses to sing for them. Rostof danced the trepaka with Major Basof; the tipsy officers "tossed" him, embraced him, and deposited him on the ground again; the soldiers of the third squadron once more "tossed" him and cried hurrah. Then they carried him to his sledge, and escorted him as far as the first station.

As is usually the case, Rostof's thoughts during the first half of his journey, from Kremenchug to Kief, were retrospective and connected with the affairs of his squadron; but, after he had gone half-way, he began to forget about the troika of roans, his quartermaster Dozho'verk, and anxious questions began to arise in his mind as to what he should find at Otradnoye. The nearer he came to his home, the more powerfully he was affected by his forebodings; as if the inner feelings were subject to the law that conditions the swiftness of falling bodies to the square of the distance. At the Otradnoye station he gave the driver three rubles for vodka, and, all out of breath, rushed like a school-boy up the steps of the old home.

After the first enthusiastic greetings, and after that strange sense of vague disappointment at the reality falling short of expectation,—"Everything is just the same; why, then, have I hastened so?"—Nikolaï began to become wonted to the old home life again. His father and mother were the same, except that they had grown a trifle older. He detected a peculiar restlessness about them, and sometimes a slight coldness between them, which was a new thing, and which Nikolaï, as soon as he discovered it, attributed to the unfortunate condition of their affairs.

Sonya was now about twenty years old. She had reached the zenith of her beauty, and gave no promise that she would ever surpass what she already was; even thus, she was pretty enough. She simply breathed happiness and love from the moment that Nikolaï came home, and this maiden's faithful, unswerving love for him had a delightful effect on him.

Nikolaï was more than all surprised at Petya and Natasha. Petya had grown into a tall, handsome, frolicsome, intelligent lad of thirteen, whose voice was already beginning to break. It was long before Nikolai could get over his amazement at Natasha, and he said, laughing, as he gazed at her:

"You're not at all the same!"

"What! have I changed for the worse?"

"Quite the contrary; but what dignity, princess!" said he, in a whisper.

"Yes, yes, yes," exclaimed Natasha, gleefully.

Natasha told him of her romance with Prince Andrei, and about his visit to Otradnoye, and showed him her last letter from him.

"Tell me! Are you not glad for me?" she asked.

"I am so calm, so happy now."

"Yes, very glad," replied Nikolai. "He is a splendid man. And are you very much in love with him?"

"How can I tell you?" replied Natasha. "I was in love with Boris, and with my teacher, and with Denisof, and—but this is not at all the same. My mind is serene and decided. I know that there is not a better man to be found, and so I feel perfectly calm and happy. It is entirely different from what it used to be.... before...."

Nikolai expressed to Natasha his dissatisfaction that the wedding was to be postponed a year; but Natasha, with some show of exasperation, contended that it could not have been otherwise, that it would have been disgraceful to force her way into his family against his father's will, and that she herself had wished it.

"You don't in the least, in the least, understand the necessities of the case," said she.

Nikolai said no more, and acquiesced. He often marveled as he looked at her. She was absolutely unlike a girl deeply in love and separated from her betrothed. Her temper was calm and even, and she was as merry as in days gone by. This was a surprise to Nikolai, and even made him look with some incredulity at her engagement with Bolkonsky. He could not make up his mind that her fate was as yet fully decided, the more from the fact that he had not seen Prince Andrei with her. It seemed to him all the time that there was something that was not as it should be in this proposed marriage.

1 The point of this lies in his calling her knyaginya, the title of a married princess, as knyazhna is that of one unmarried.

"Why this postponement? Why are they not formally betrothed?" he asked himself. Once, when speaking with his mother about his sister, he found to his surprise, and to a certain degree his satisfaction, that his mother also did not in the depths of her heart feel any great confidence in the engagement.

"This is what he writes," said she, showing her son a letter which she had received from Prince Andrei, with that secret feeling of discontent which a mother always has toward her daughter's future married happiness. "He writes that he will not be back before December. What do you suppose can detain him so? It must be he is ill. His health is very delicate. Do not say anything to Natasha. Don't be surprised that she is happy; these are the last days of her girlhood, and I know how it affects her whenever we get a letter from him. However, it is all in God's hands, and all will be well," she concluded; adding, as usual, "He is a splendid man."

CHAPTER II

The first days after Nikolai's return, he was grave, and even depressed. He was tormented by the present necessity of making an investigation into the stupid details of the household economy, for which his mother had begged him to come home. On the third day after his return, in order to get this burden from his shoulders as soon as possible, he went, with contracted brows, sternly, and not giving himself time to decide what he was going to do, to the wing where Mitenka lived, and demanded of him the "accounts of everything." What he meant by the "accounts of everything," he had even less of an idea than Mitenka, who, nevertheless, was thrown into alarm and perplexity.

Mitenka's explanations about his accounts were soon finished. The starosta of the estate, and the starosta of the commune, who were waiting in the anteroom, listened with terror and satisfaction at first, as the young count’s voice began to grow fiercer and louder, while they could distinguish terrible words of abuse, following one upon another.

“You brigand, you ungrateful wretch!... I’ll whip you like a dog!... You’re not dealing with my papenka this time;” and words of the like import.

Then these men, with no less satisfaction and terror, saw the young count, all flushed, and with bloodshot eyes, dragging Mitenka by the collar, and reinforcing his efforts with very dexterous applications of his knees and feet, whenever the pauses between his words gave him a convenient chance; while he cried at the top of his voice:

“Get out of here! you villain! Don’t you ever show your face here again!”

Mitenka flew down the six steps head first, and landed in a bed of shrubbery. This shrubbery was a famous place of refuge for delinquents at Otradnoye. Mitenka himself, when he returned tipsy from town, was wont to hide in it; and many of the inhabitants of Otradnoye, trying to get out of Mitenka’s way, knew the advantages of this place as a refuge.

Mitenka’s wife and her sister, with terror-stricken faces, peered out of the door of the room, where a polished samovar was bubbling, and where the high-post bedstead affected by overseers could be seen, covered with a patchwork quilt.

The young count, all out of breath, and giving them no attention, strode by them with resolute steps, and went into the house.

The countess, who had heard from the maids all that had taken place in the wing, was, in one sense, delighted at the direction which their affairs were now evidently going to take; and in another she was disquieted at the way in which her son had taken hold of the matter.

She went several times on tiptoe to his door, and listened while he was smoking one pipe after another
The next day the old count called Nikolai to one side, and with a timid smile said:—

"But do you know, my dear, you wasted your fire! Mitenka has told me all about it."

"I knew," thought Nikolai, "that I should never accomplish anything here, in this idiotic world."

"You were angry with him because he did not reckon in those seven hundred rubles. But, do you know, they were carried over, and you did not look on the other page."

"Papenka, he is a scoundrel and a thief; I know he is! And what I have done, I have done. But if you don't wish it, I won't say anything more to him about it."

"No, my dear." The count was also confused. He was conscious that he himself had been a bad administrator of his wife's estate, and that he was to blame toward his children; but he did not know how to set things right. "No, I beg of you, take charge of our affairs; I am old, I...."

"No, papenka, forgive me if I have done anything disagreeable to you; I am less able to attend to it than you are. — The devil take these muzhiks, and accounts, and carryings over," he said to himself. "I used to know well enough what quarter stakes on a six at faro meant; but this carrying over to the next page, I don't know anything about it at all," said he to himself; and from that time forth he gave no more attention to their pecuniary affairs. Once, however, the countess called her son to her, and told him that she had a note of hand given her by Anna Mikhailovna, for two thousand rubles, and she asked Nikolai's advice as to what ought to be done about it.

"This is what I think," replied Nikolai. "You have told me that I was to decide the question. Well, I don't like Anna Mikhailovna, and I don't like Boris; but they have been friends of ours, and are poor. This is what we will do, then!" and he took the note and tore it in two; and this action made the old countess actually sob with delight.
After this, the young Rostof entirely forswore interference with their business matters, and entered with passionate enthusiasm into the delights of hunting with the hounds, for which the old count set him an example on a large scale.

CHAPTER III

Already the wintry frosts had begun, each morning, to chain up the soil, soaked by the autumnal rains; already there was green only in patches, and these made a vivid contrast against the strips of brownish stubble-fields, trodden down by the cattle, and the patches of winter or spring wheat, or the russet lines of the buckwheat fields. The forest tree-tops, which even as early as the end of August had been green islands amid the black fields of winter wheat and the corn stubble, were now golden and crimson islands amid the fields of bright green wheat.

The gray hare had already more than half changed his coat; the foxes were beginning to leave their holes, and young wolves were larger than dogs. It was the very height of the hunting season. The hounds belonging to that eager young huntsman, Rostof, were now in excellent training for their work; but they had been taken out so assiduously, that, by the general advice of the whippers-in, it had been decided to give them three days' rest, and to set upon the twenty-eighth of September for the hunt; at which time they would begin with a certain dense forest, where there was a litter of young wolves.

Such was the state of affairs on the twenty-sixth of September.

All that day the hunting train was at home. It had been bitter cold, but toward evening it grew warmer and began to thaw. On the morning of the twenty-seventh, when young Rostof went in his dressing-gown to his window, he looked out on a morning which could not have been better for hunting; the very sky seemed to be melt ing and flooding out over the earth. There was no sign of a breeze. The only motion in the air was that faint stir of microscopic drops of mist or fog, falling from above. On the bare limbs of the park trees transparent drops hung and fell on the leaves that carpeted the ground. The garden soil had a peculiar black and glistening appearance, like poppy, and within a short distance lost itself under the dim and moist curtain of fog.

Nikolai stepped out upon the wet doorsteps, all covered with trails of mud. There was an odor of dying forest vegetation, and of dogs. Milka, the black-spotted bitch, with broad hind quarters, and big black goggle eyes, got up when she saw her master, stretched herself back, and lay down like a hare; then unexpectedly leaped up and licked his nose and ears. Another dog, a greyhound, seeing his master, came bounding up the garden path, arching his back, and impetuously raising his tail, began to rub around Nikolai's legs.

"O ho!" rang out at this moment that inimitable huntsman's call, which compromises in itself the deepest bass and the clearest tenor, and around the corner appeared the whipper-in and hunter, Danilo: a grizzled, wrinkled man, with his hair cropped, leaving a knob, after the fashion of the Ukraïna, and carrying a long whip, with curling lash. He had that independent expression and scorn for all the world so characteristic of huntsmen. He took off his Circassian cap in his barin's presence, and looked at him scornfully. This expression of scorn was not meant to be insulting to the barin; Nikolai knew that, scornful and superior as this Danilo seemed to be, he was, nevertheless, his devoted servant and huntsman.

"Danila!" said Nikolai, with a timid consciousness that in this perfect hunting weather, with these dogs, and this huntsman, he was seized by that indefinable passion for hunting which makes a man forget all his former good resolutions like a fond lover in the presence of his mistress.

1 Pravilo, rudder.
"What do you please to require, your illustriousness?" asked a deep, antiphonal bass, hoarse with shouting at the hounds; and two bright black eyes gazed out from under the brows at the silent barin. 'Well, and can't you resist?' these two eyes seemed to be asking.

"Fine day, isn't it? A chase and a race, hey?" asked Nikolai, pulling Milka's ears.

Danilo said nothing, and winked his eyes.

"I sent Uvarka out at sunrise this morning to listen," said his deep bass, after a minute's pause. "He says she's drawn into the Otradnensky zakas, and they're howling there."

He meant that a she-wolf, which they both knew about, had gone with her whelps into the Otradnensky forest preserves, which was a small detached property, about two versts from the house.

"Well, we must go after them, mustn't we?" said Nikolai. "Come to me with Uvarka, will you."

"Just as you order!"

"See they are fed, then."

"All right!"

In five minutes, Danilo and Uvarka were standing in Nikolai's great library. Though Danila was not very tall, the sight of him in the room irresistibly made one think of a horse, or a bear, surrounded by furniture and the conditions of civilized life; Danilo was himself conscious of this, and, according to his habit, stood as near the door as possible, striving to talk in an unnaturally low tone, and to keep from moving, lest he should break something, and saying what he had to say as rapidly as possible, so as to get out into the open air, under the sky instead of the ceiling.

Having asked the requisite number of questions, and elicited from Danilo—who was fully as anxious as himself to go—the information that it would not hurt the dogs, Nikolai ordered the horses to be saddled.

But, just as Danilo was on the point of leaving the room, Natasha came hurrying in with swift steps, not having stopped to do up her hair, or finish dressing, but wearing her nurse’s shawl. Petya came running in with her.

“Are you going?” asked Natasha. “I thought so! Sonya declared that you were not going. I knew that to-day was such a perfect day that you would have to go.”

“Yes, we’re going,” curtly replied Nikolai, who, as he intended to make a serious business of hunting that day, had no wish to take Natasha and Petya. “We are going, but after wolves only; it would bore you.”

“You know that is just what I like best of anything,” said Natasha. “It’s too bad to be going yourself, and to have the horses saddled, and not say a word to us!”

“Vain are obstacles to Russians!’ let us go!” cried Petya.

“No, but you can’t go; mamenka told you that it was out of the question,” said Nikolai, turning to Natasha. “Yes, I am going; I certainly am going,” insisted Natasha, firmly.

“Danila, have the saddles put on for us, and have Mikhaïla bring around my dogs,” said she, addressing the whipper-in.

It had been trying and uncomfortable for Danilo to be in the confinement of the room; but to receive an order from the young lady seemed incredible. He cast down his eyes and made haste to go, pretending that it did not concern him, and striving not to strike against her in any way.

CHAPTER IV

The old count, who had always kept up an immense hunting establishment, had turned it over to his son’s management; but on this day, the twenty-seventh of September, feeling particularly cheerful, he determined to be of the party.

In two hours the whole hunt was gathered at the front doorsteps. Nikolai, with a grave and solemn face, which made it evident that he could not be distracted by trifles, walked right by Natasha and Petya, who were trying to say something to him. He personally inspected everything, sent forward the pack with the huntsmen, mounted his sorrel Donets; and, whistling to the dogs of his own leash, he started off through the threshing-floor into the field that stretched toward the Otradnensky preserves. The old count's steed, a dun-colored gelding, named Viflyanka, was in charge of the count's groom; he himself was to ride in his drozhsky straight to the muset which he had designated.

The whole number of hounds brought together was fifty-four, together with six whippers-in and feeders. Besides the gentlemen, there were also eight greyhound-grooms, followed by more than twoscore greyhounds; so that, with the master's dogs in leash, there were, all told, about one hundred and thirty dogs, and twenty mounted huntsmen.

Each dog knew who his master was, and answered to his call. Each man knew his duty, his place, and his work.

As soon as they had ridden beyond the hedge, all, without unnecessary noise or talking, galloped smoothly and evenly along the road, and then struck into the fields that led to the Otradnensky preserves.

As soon as the horses were out of the beaten track, they made their way across the field, as if it were a carpet of yielding grass, occasionally splashing through pools of water. The misty sky continued the same, and the moisture fell monotonously to the ground. The air was calm, mild, unresonant. Occasionally were heard a huntsman's whistle, the snorting of a horse, the crack of the long lash, and the whine of a dog which had left its place.

After they had ridden about a verst, suddenly out of the fog loomed five more riders with dogs, coming to meet the Rostofs. In front of them rode a hale and hearty old man, with heavy gray mustaches.

"Good-morning, 'little uncle,'" cried Nikolai, as the old man rode up to him.

1 Dyadyushka, diminutive.
"Here's a how-de-do! I was sure of it," said the old man. He was a neighbor and distant relative of the Rostofs—a landed proprietor of small means. "I knew it, you could not resist it, and it's good you came. Here's a how-de-do!" This was a favorite phrase of the old man's. "Look out for the cover, double quick, for my Girchik reports that the Ilagins, and all their train, are in the stubble, and they might—here's a how-de-do!—might snatch the litter away from under our very noses!"

"That's where I am going. Say, shall we join packs?" asked Nikolai.

They united all the hounds into one large pack, and the old man, whom Nikolai called "little uncle," rode along by his side. Natasha, muffled up in shawls, out of which peered her eager face, with bright, glistening eyes, galloped up to them, followed by Petya and Mikhail, the huntsman, who were her inseparable companions, and by a groom, who was delegated to attend her. Petya was full of glee, and kept whipping up and hauling in his horse. Natasha sat firmly and gracefully on her raven black Arabchik, and reined him in with a practised hand, though without effort.

The "little uncle" looked disapprovingly at Petya and Natasha. He did not believe in combining frivolities with the serious business of hunting.

"Good-morning, 'little uncle'; we are going too," shouted Petya.

"Good-morning to you, good-morning; don't ride the dogs down!" cried the old man, severely.

"Nikolenka, what a splendid dog Trunila is! He knew me!" said Natasha, pointing to her favorite greyhound.

"Trunila, in the first place, is not a dog, but a hound," mused Nikolai, and gave his sister a stern glance, trying to make her realize the immense distance that separated them at that moment. Natasha realized it.

1 Chistoye dyelo marsch! An almost meaningless semi-military phrase. Literally: "Clean thing! forward!"—invented by the speaker, and characteristic of him.
“Don’t you imagine, ‘little uncle,’ that we shall be in any one's way,” said Natasha. “We will stay in our own places and not stir.”

“An excellent idea, little countess,”¹ said the “little uncle.” “But mind you don’t fall off your horse,” he added. “For you see,—here’s a how-de-do!—you see you've nothing to hold on by!”

The “island” of the Otradnensky preserves was now in sight, two or three hundred yards distant, and the cavalcade rode up toward it. Rostof and the “little uncle,” having definitely decided where they should set in the hounds, and shown Natasha her post, a place where there was not the slightest chance of anything ever passing, crossed through a ravine into the woods.

“Well, little nephew, stand on solid ground,” said the “little uncle.” “Take care not to let her get by.”

“That depends,” replied Rostof. “Phüt! Karaï!” he cried, by this call answering the old man’s words. Karaï was an aged, deformed, ugly-faced hound, famous for having once tackled by himself a she-wolf.

All got to their posts.

The old count, knowing his son's passionate zeal for hunting, had made good time, so as not to be behind-hand; and the cavalcade had scarcely reached the preserve, when Ilya Andreyitch, cheerful and ruddy, with shaking cheeks, came jolting across the fields, behind his three black horses, and was set down at the muset which he had selected. Smoothing out his fur shuba, and getting his hunting equipment, he mounted his glossy Viflyanka, fat, kind, and steady, and as gray as himself. The horses and the drozhsky were sent home. Count Ilya Andreyitch, although not a keen huntsman at heart, nevertheless was well acquainted with the rules of venery; and he rode off to the edge of the forest, gathered up his reins, settled himself in the saddle, and, feeling conscious that he was all ready, glanced around with a smile.

Near him stood his valet, an old-fashioned but heavy rider, Semyon Chekmar. Chekmar held in leash three fierce-looking wolf-hounds, not less fat and sleek than master and horse. Two dogs, old and intelligent enough to be out of leash, stretched themselves out on the ground. A hundred paces farther along the edge of the forest was stationed the count's second whipper-in, Mitka, a splendid rider and passionate huntsman. The count, in accordance with time-honored custom, before the hunt began, drank a silver cup full of zapekanotchka, or root brandy, took a snack of lunch, and then drank a half-bottle of his favorite Bordeaux.

¹ Grasinyetchka.

Ilya Andreyitch was a trifle flushed from the wine and the ride; his eyes grew moist and had a peculiar gleam; and as he sat in his saddle, muffled in his shuba, he had the aspect of a child who has been got ready for a ride.

The lean Chekmar, with sunken cheeks, having got things settled to his satisfaction, looked up at his barin, whose inseparable companion he had been for upwards of thirty years, and, perceiving that he was in good humor, waited for some pleasant talk. Just then a third person rode up cautiously — evidently the result of careful training — and, coming out from behind the woods, paused not far from the count.

This person was an old man, with a gray beard, in a woman's capote and high collar. This was the buffoon who bore the woman's name Nastasya Ivanovna.

"Well, Nastasya Ivanovna," said the old count to him in a whisper, and giving him a wink, "if you should dare to scare away the brute, Danila would give it to you!"

"I can defend myself," said Nastasya Ivanovna.

"Sh-sh-sh-sh-sh!" hissed the count, and, turning to Semyon, he asked, "Have you seen Natalia Ilyinitchna? — Where is she?"

"She and Piotr Ilyitch were stationed in the high grass near Zharovo," replied Semyon, with a smile. "She's a lady, but she's going to have a great hunt all the same."

"And aren't you surprised, Semyon, to see how she 1 Buryan, steppe-grass.

rides—hey?” asked the count. “She rides as well as a man!”

“Of course I’m surprised. Such daring! such skill!”

“And where is Nikolasha? On Lyadovo hill, I suppose?” asked the count, in a whisper.

“That’s where he is. He knows well enough where the best places are. And he rides so cleverly, too; Danila and I were thunderstruck at him the other day,” replied Semyon, knowing what would please the count.

“He rides well, does he? Hey? Fine fellow on a horse, is he? Hey?”

“Like a picture! How he run that fox t’other day out of the steppe at Zavarzino! How he did gallop out of the woods, ’t was a caution! Horse worth a thousand, but the rider beyond price! ’T would be a hard job to find such another young fellow.”

“It would, indeed,” interposed the count, regretting that Semyon did not spin his story out longer. “’T would be a hard job, would it?” turning back the flap of his shubka, and searching for his snuff-box.

“Then the other day, coming out of mass, in all his regalia, when Mikhail-to Sidoruitch....”

But Semyon did not conclude his sentence, having distinctly heard, owing to the stillness of the atmosphere, the howling of a hound or two, signifying that the hunt was on; he bent down his head and listened, and gave a warning gesture to his barin.

“They are after the whelps!” he whispered. “They are making straight for Lyadovskaya.”

The count, with the smile still lingering on his lips, gazed into the distance, along the dike, and held the snuff-box in his hand, forgetting to take a pinch. Instantly following the baying of the hounds came the sound of Danilo’s heavy horn, the signal that the wolf was found. Then the pack united their voices with those of the first three hounds; and then they could hear the hounds breaking in, across the ravine, with that peculiar howl which is the sign to the huntsman that they have discovered the wolf. The riders had not yet begun to set on the dogs, but were uttering the uliuliu; and louder than all rang out Danilo’s voice, now in bass, now in piercingly shrill notes; it seemed as if his voice filled the whole forest, and burst out beyond the forest bounds, and rang far over the fields.

After listening for a number of seconds in silence, the count and his groom were convinced that the hunt had divided into two packs. The larger half, vehemently giving tongue, were driving farther afield; the other pack were rushing along the forest past the count, while behind them was heard Danilo’s uliuliu. The sounds mingled and melted together, but seemed to be growing fainter in the distance. Semyon sighed, and stooped down to disentangle his leash, a young puppy having got the cords mixed up. The count also sighed; and, noticing that he had his snuff-box still in his hand, opened it and took out a pinch of snuff.

"Back," cried Semyon to the young hound, which was trying to make for the woods. The count was startled, and dropped his snuff-box. Nastasya Ivanovna dismounted, and was just on the point of picking it up. The count and Semyon were looking at him. Suddenly, as often happens, the sounds of the hunt came nearer, and it seemed as if the baying mouths of the dogs and Danilo’s uliuliu were directly upon them.

The count looked round, and at his right saw Mitka, who, with starting eyes, was staring at him, and, lifting his cap, directed his attention in front of him to the other side.

"Look out!" he shouted, in such a voice that it was evident that this word had been for some time painfully struggling to escape. And, letting loose his leash, he dashed in the count’s direction. The count and Semyon sprang out from the cover, and saw at their left a wolf swinging easily along, and, with a noiseless lope, making for the very cover where they had been in hiding. The ferocious dogs yelped, and, tearing themselves free from the leash, flung themselves after the wolf, almost under the legs of the horses.

The wolf paused in his course, awkwardly, like one suffering with the quinsy, turned his head, with its wide forehead, in the direction of the dogs, and then again, with the same easy, waddling gait, gave one spring, and then another, and, shaking his "stump," disappeared in the cover.

At the same instant, with a roar that rather resembled a whine, from the opposite edge of the forest, appeared first one, then a second, then a third hound, and then the whole pack came pouring out into the field, in the very track by which the wolf had sneaked away and escaped. On the heels of the hounds appeared Danilo's horse, all black with sweat, breaking through the hazel bushes. Over his long back, bending forward, and doubled up like a ball, sat Danilo, hatless, with his gray hair disheveled and falling around his sweaty face.

"Uliuliu! Uliuliu!" he was shouting. When he saw the count, his eyes flashed fire.

"You sh...." he began, menacing the count with his upraised whip-handle. "You've lost that wolf! What hunters!"

And, as if scorning to have further conversation with the confused and startled count, he gave the wet flank of his chestnut stallion the wrathful blow which had been directed against the count, and dashed after the hounds. The count, like one who had been chastised, remained motionless; and, looking around with a scared smile, was going to try to gather sympathy for his situation from Semyon.

But Semyon had disappeared; he was riding in and out of the bushes, trying to start the wolf up from the thicket. The masters of the greyhounds also were beating up the brute from all sides. But the wolf had made his way into the bushes, and not a single hunter got sight of him.

CHAPTER V

Nikolai Rostof, meantime, had not left his post, and was anxiously expecting the brute. By the nearer and more distant sounds of the hunt; by the baying of the hounds, whose voices he could distinguish; by the shouts of the whippers-in, advancing and retreating, — he had an idea of what was going on in the "island." He knew that the "island" sheltered growing and full-grown wolves; that is, old wolves and their whelps. He knew that the hounds had divided into two packs; that in one place they were on the right scent, and that elsewhere they had met with bad luck. He expected each second to see the beast making in his direction. He made a thousand different conjectures as to which side the brute would come out, and how he should attack him. His heart was filled with mingled hope and despair.

Several times he offered up a prayer to God that the wolf might come in his way; he prayed with that sense of passionate anxiety with which men are wont to pray under the influence of some powerful excitement, even though it may be due to the most trivial cause.

"Now what would it be to Thee," he said in his prayer, "to do this for me? I know that Thou art mighty, and that it is a sin to ask Thee for such a thing; but, for God's sake, let an old full-grown wolf come my way, and let Karar get a death clutch on her throat, in sight of the 'little uncle' who keeps glancing over in this direction."

A thousand times during that half-hour, Rostof swept his eyes eagerly, restlessly, and with stubborn purpose, around that thicket of forest, where two mighty oaks looked down upon the aspen underbrush; and at the ravine, with its gullied banks; and at the "little uncle's" cap, just visible underneath the bushes on the right.

"No, I shan't have this luck," thought Rostof. "But how jolly it would be! No hope! always the same bad luck with me at cards, and in war, and everywhere."

Austerlitz and Dolokhov, in vivid but swift alternation, flashed through his mind.

"If I could only just once in my life run down a full-grown wolf, that is all that I would ask for!" he said to himself, straining his ears and his eyes, as his gaze swept the thicket from left to right, and as he tried to distinguish the slightest variation in the noise of the hunt.
Then again he glanced to the right, and beheld something swiftly moving across the open field in his direction.

"No, it is impossible!" thought Rostof, with a heavy sigh, as a man sighs when what he has been long looking forward to is practically accomplished. And here the greatest piece of good fortune was accomplishing so simply, so noiselessly, so undemonstratively, without a sign! Rostof could not believe his eyes; and this incredulity lasted more than a second. The wolf came running forward, and leaped clumsily over the ravine that lay across his path. It was an aged brute, with a gray back, and a clearly marked russet belly. He ran along at no great speed, evidently convinced that no one could see him. Rostof, not daring to breathe, glanced at his dogs; they were lying down or standing up all around, but had not yet discovered the wolf, or realized what was going on. Old Karaï, bending his head back, and showing his yellow teeth, occasionally snapping them together, was making a spiteful search for a flea, on his haunch.

"Uliuliliul!" whispered Rostof, thrusting out his lips. The dogs, shaking their chains, and pricking up their ears, sprang to their feet. Karaï ceased his flea-hunting and got up, cocking his ears, and slightly wagging his tail, on which still hung a few shreds of hair.

"Shall I let 'em loose yet, or not?" queried Rostof, while the wolf was making in his direction, and steadily increasing his distance from the woods. Suddenly the wolf's whole appearance underwent a change: a thrill ran over him, at the sight of what he had never probably experienced before, a pair of human eyes fixed on him; and slightly raising his head toward the huntsman, he paused.

"Back or forward? Eh! it's all the same! Forward; we'll see," he seemed to say to himself; and, without looking around, he dashed ahead, with occasional leaps, easy and long, but decided.

"Uliuliliul!" cried Nikolai, in a voice that sounded not his own; his good steed, of her own accord, bore him forward down the slope, leaping the ravine, to cut off the wolf; and still swifter, entirely outstripping her, rushed the hounds. Nikolai did not hear his own shout, was not conscious of the pace at which he was riding, saw neither the dogs nor the ground over which he was carried; saw only the wolf, which, quickening his speed, bounded on, without swerving, in the direction of the ravine. The black-spotted, wide-haunched Milka was the first to get close to the wild beast. Nearer, nearer, she seemed to press—there, she leaps upon him! But the wolf swerved a trifle toward her, and, instead of attacking, as was usually the case with her, Milka, suddenly raising her tail, came to point.

"Uliuliuliuliul!" cried Nikolai.

The red Liubim leaped beyond Milka, impetuously flung himself on the wolf, and gripped him by the haunch; but, at the same instant, overcome by panic, he sprang to one side. The wolf crouched down, clapped his teeth together, then sprang up again, and bounded forward, followed at an arshin's distance by all the hounds, though they avoided getting closer.

"He'll escape! No, that's impossible!" mused Nikolai, continuing to shout in a hoarse voice.

"Karaï! Uliuliul!" he screamed, trying to make out where the old wolf-hound was; he was now his only reliance. Karaï, with all the strength left him by his advanced age, bounding forward, looking at the wolf from the corner of his eyes, was running heavily side by side with the brute, trying to get in front of him. But, owing to the swiftness of the wolf, and the comparative slowness of the hound, it was evident that Karaï's calculation was to be mistaken.

Nikolai now began to see the forest in front of him, which, if the wolf succeeded in reaching it, would probably prove his safety. Just then, in front of them, a pack of dogs and a huntsman came in sight, dashing almost directly toward him. Here again was a hope. A dark brown young dog, with a long body, belonging to a kennel unknown to Rostof, was flying eagerly forward, directly toward the wolf, and quite upset him. The wolf swiftly and most unexpectedly sprang up and threw himself upon the dark brown hound, chattered his teeth, and the hound, covered with blood, from a great gash in his side, with a pitiful howl, beat his head on the ground.

“Karaïushka! Oh, heavens!” mourned Nikolai. The old hound, with the tufts of hair flying out from his haunches, had taken advantage of the pause that he had made to block the wolf’s path, and was now within five paces of him. The wolf, apparently conscious of the peril, looked out of the corner of his eyes at Karaï, put his stump of a tail as far as possible under his legs, and went off at a mighty bound. But, at this instant,—Nikolai saw that something extraordinary happened to the dog,—Karaï, quick as a flash, was on the wolf’s back, and the two were rolling heels over head down into the ravine in front of them.

The moment that Nikolai caught sight of the dog and the wolf rolling at the bottom of the ravine, in one indiscriminate mass, out of which could be resolved the wolf’s gray hide, his hind leg stretched out, and his scared face, and panting, with laid-back ears (Karaï still held him by the gorge), —the minute that Nikolai saw this was the happiest moment of his whole life. He was just grasping the saddle-bow to dismount and give the wolf his finishing stroke, when suddenly, from out of that mass of dogs, the brute’s head was extended, then his fore paws were laid on the edge of the ravine. The wolf chattered his teeth — Karai had now let go of his gullet — gave a mighty leap with his hind legs, and, flirting his tail, again got his distance from the dogs, and was off at full speed. Karaï, with bristling hair, apparently either bruised or wounded, crawled painfully out of the ravine.

“My God! what does it mean?” cried Nikolai, in despair.

The “little uncle’s” whipper-in started from the other side to cut off the wolf’s course, and the dogs again brought the wolf to bay. Again they gathered round him. Nikolai, his whipper-in, the “little uncle,” and his huntsmen circled around the wolf, crying their uliuliu, and screaming to the dogs, at each minute, whenever the wolf sat up on his haunches, expecting to dismount, and each time dashing forward, whenever the wolf shook himself free, and tried to dash toward the thicket, which was his only salvation.

At the very beginning of this wolf-baiting, Danilo, hearing the hunters' uliuliu, came galloping along the edge of the forest. He got there in time to see Karaif grapple with the wolf; and he pulled in his horse, expecting to see that the game was finished. But when the huntsmen did not dismount, and the wolf shook himself and made off, Danilo spurred on his chestnut; not indeed at the wolf, but in a straight line toward the thicket, in the same way as Karaif had done, so as to intercept the beast. By reason of this move, he caught up with the wolf just as the "little uncle's" hounds had brought him to a halt for the second time. Danilo galloped forward silently, holding an unsheathed dagger in his left hand; and like a flail fell the strokes of his whip on his chestnut's laboring sides.

Nikolai had not seen or heard Danilo until his heavily panting chestnut dashed by; and then he heard the sound of a falling body, and saw that Danilo had flung himself into the midst of the dogs, back of the wolf, and was trying to clutch him by the ears. It was now manifest to the dogs, and to the huntsmen, and to the wolf, even, that all was over. The wild beast, timidly laying back his ears, was struggling to gather himself up once more; but the dogs formed a ring round him. Danilo, reaching forward, made a staggering step, and with all his weight threw himself upon the wolf, as if he were lying down to rest, and seized him by the ears. Nikolai was going to stab him, but Danilo muttered:—

"Don't do it, we'll gag him!" and, changing his position, he placed his foot on the wolf's neck. Then they put a stake into the wolf's jaws, fastened him as if they were getting him into a leash, tied his legs, and Danilo twice rolled the brute over and over.

With weary but happy faces, they lifted the live, full-grown wolf on the shying and whinnying horse; and, accompanied by the dogs, all yelping at him, they took him to the place of general rendezvous.

All hastened up and began to examine the wolf, which, with his great broad-browed head hanging down, with the stake in his chops, glared from his great glassy eyes at all that throng of dogs and men surrounding him. When he was touched, he would draw together his helpless paws, and glare fiercely, and at the same time steadily, at them all. Count Ilya Andreyitch also came riding up, and had a look at the wolf.

"Oh, what an old one," said he. "Full-grown, hey?" he asked of Danilo, who stood near him.

"Indeed he is, your illustriousness," replied Danilo, respectfully taking off his cap. The count remembered the wolf which had got past him, and his encounter with Danilo.

"Still, my boy, you were in a bad temper," said the count.

Danilo made no reply, and merely smiled with embarrassment—a childishly sweet and pleasant smile.

CHAPTER VI

The old count rode off home. Natasha and Petya promised to follow immediately. The hunt went farther, as it was still early in the day. Toward noon they sent the hounds into a dell grown up with a dense young forest. Nikolai, taking his position on the hillside, could overlook all his huntsmen.

On the other side from Nikolai were fields; and there his whipper-in had taken his post alone, in a pit behind a hazel copse. As soon as the dogs were slipped, Nikolai heard the sharp yelp of one of his favorite dogs—Voltorn; the other hounds also gave tongue, now ceasing, and then again taking up the cry. In a minute, from the forest, the cry to fox was heard: and the whole pack rushed off pell-mell toward the open, in the direction of the field and away from Nikolai.

He saw the dog-feeders, in their red caps, dashing off along the edge of the overgrown dell; he saw, also, the dogs, and every instant he expected the fox to show himself in that direction on the field.

The huntsman stationed in the pit gave a start, and let loose the dogs; and then Nikolai saw a strange-looking red fox crouching down, and hurriedly making across the field, with rumpled brush. The dogs began to close in upon her. Then, as they came closer to her, lo! the fox began to dodge about among them, in circles, making the circles ever shorter and shorter, and sweeping her furry brush (which the hunters call truba a trumpet) around her; and then, lo! one, a white dog, flew at her; and this one was followed by a black dog; and then all were mingled in confusion, and the dogs, as they stood, scarcely swerving, made a sort of star, all their tails pointing outwards. A couple of huntsmen galloped up toward the dogs, one in a red cap, the other, a stranger, in a green kaftan.

"What can that mean?" queried Nikolai. "Where did that huntsman come from? It's not one of 'little uncle's.'"

The men despatched the fox, and stood for a long time, without mounting or tying her to the straps. Near by, with projecting saddles, stood their horses, which they held by the bridle; and the dogs threw themselves down. The huntsmen were gesticulating and doing something with the fox. Then there rang out the sound of a bugle, the conventional signal of a dispute.

"That's one of Ilagin's hunters; and he's quarreling with our Ivan about something," said Nikolai's whipper-in.

Nikolai sent the man to fetch his sister and Petya; and then rode slowly, at a footpace, to the place where the dog-feeders had collected the hounds. Several huntsmen were galloping up to the scene of the dispute. Nikolai dismounted and stood near the hounds, with Natasha and Petya, who had now come up, and waited till word should be brought as to the issue of the dispute.

Out from behind the skirt of the forest came the quarrelsome huntsman, with the fox at his saddle-straps, and galloped up to his young barin. While still at a distance, he took off his cap, and tried to speak respectfully; but he was pale and out of breath, and his face was wrathful. One of his eyes was blackened, but he was apparently unconscious of the fact.

“What was the matter with you there?” asked Nicolaï.

“What do you suppose! he would be after snatching it away from among our hounds! And it was my mouse-colored bitch, too, that had grabbed her! Come now, decide! He tried to get away our fox. Now I’ll have a whack at his foxes. Here she is, on the saddle- straps. Or would you like a taste of this?” .... pointing to his dagger, and evidently imagining that he was still talking with his enemy.

Nicolaï, not stopping to discuss the matter with the huntsman, told his sister and Petya to wait for him, and rode off to the place where the rival hunt of the Ilagins was collected.

The victorious huntsman joined the throng of whippers-in; and there, surrounded by his sympathetic admirers, he related his exploit.

The truth of the matter was that Ilagin, with whom the Rostofs had, in days gone by, had some disputes, as well as lawsuits, was hunting in places usually preempted by the Rostofs; and, on this occasion, he had apparently given special orders to go to the “island” where the Rostofs were hunting, and allowed his whippers-in to snatch the game from his rival’s dogs.

Nicolaï had never seen Ilagin; but, as was always the case, knowing no half-way in his judgments and feelings, and believing certain reports of the violence and arbitrary conduct of this proprietor, he hated him with all his heart, and considered him his worst enemy. He now rode up to him, full of angry emotions, and firmly grasping his long whip, ready for the most decisive and risky proceedings against his enemy.

He had just ridden up to a jut of the forest, when he saw riding in his direction a portly gentleman, in a beaver cap, on a handsome raven-black steed, and accompanied by two huntsmen.

Instead of an enemy, Nikolai found in Ilagin a well-bred, representative barin, who manifested a special desire to make the young count's acquaintance. Riding up to Rostof, Ilagin raised his beaver cap, and declared that he was very sorry for what had taken place; that he had commanded the huntsman who had permitted himself to trespass on another's preserve to be punished. He craved the count's acquaintance, and invited him to hunt on his grounds.

Natasha, apprehensive lest her brother might do something terrible, came up in great anxiety, and drew up at a little distance behind him. When she saw that the rivals were greeting each other with friendly courtesy, she joined them. Ilagin lifted his beaver cap still higher as he saw Natasha, and, with a pleasant smile, said that the countess resembled Diana, both by her passion for hunting and by her beauty, of which he had heard many reports.

Ilagin, in order to smooth over his huntsman's indiscretion, pressingly urged Rostof to go to a steep hillside of his, about a verst away, which he kept for his own private use, and which, on his word, was swarming with hares. Nikolai consented; and the hunting party, doubled in numbers, swept on their way.

In order to reach Ilagin's preserve, they had to strike across country. The huntsmen made common cause. The gentlemen rode together. The "little uncle," Rostof, Ilagin, each stealthily examined the dogs of the other, striving not to let the others remark it, and anxiously searched for possible rivals among the dogs of the others.

Rostof was especially struck by the beauty of a small thoroughbred young bitch, spotted with red, and rather slender, with muscles like steel, with a delicate little muzzle, and with prominent black eyes. She belonged to Ilagin’s pack. He had heard of the rarity of Ilagin’s dogs; and in this pretty little dog he recognized a rival to his Milka. In the midst of a sedate conversation about the crops of the current year, which Ilagin had started, Nikolai called his attention to this little spotted bitch.

“That’s a lovely little bitch you have!” said he, in a careless tone. “Full of mettle?”

“That one? Yes, that one’s a good dog! She’s a hunter,” replied Ilagin, speaking with affected indifference of his red-spotted Yorza, for which he had paid a neighbor, the year before, three families of household serfs. “You didn’t have much of a yield of grain, either, did you?” he asked, resuming the conversation that he had begun. And then, considering it no more than fair to mollify the young count, in the same way, Ilagin looked at his dogs, and picking out Milka, whose breadth of beam first attracted his attention, he said:

“That black-spotted bitch of yours is a handsome one, too — well worth having!”

“Yes, pretty good, full of go!” replied Nikolai. “If only an old gray hare would start across that field, I would show you what kind of a dog she is!” he thought; and, turning to one of his huntsmen, he said he would give a ruble if he would find a hare “on his form,” that is, hiding in his nest.

“I cannot understand,” pursued Ilagin, “how it is that sportsmen can be jealous of other men’s game and dogs. I will tell you how it is with me, count. I enjoy going out to hunt; you see, you are apt to fall in with pleasant company, like this. For what could be better?” —he took off his beaver cap again to Natasha. “But as for merely counting the pelts—that’s a matter of indifference to me!”

“That’s a fact!”

“Or why should it trouble me that some other dog, and not mine, got on the scent first? I get just as much sport from looking on at the course; don’t you, count? So I judge....”
Just at this time was heard the long halloo—"Atoo yevoa,"—from one of the greyhound-keepers, who had been set on the watch. He was standing half-way down the slope, on a hillock, with his whip upraised; and again he uttered the long-drawn "A—too—yevoa."

This halloo, and the upraised whipstock, signified that he had caught sight of a couching hare.

"On the scent, I imagine," said Ilagin, carelessly. "What say you, count? Shall we give him a run?"

"Yes, we must be after him; certainly! All together, shall we not?" replied Nikolai, glancing at Yorza and the "little uncle's" red Rugai, the two rivals against which he had never as yet had a chance to pit his own dogs. "Now what if they get my Milka by the ears!" he thought to himself as, side by side with the "little uncle" and Ilagin, he galloped off toward the hare.

"A full-grown fellow, is n't he?" asked Ilagin, as they came up to the hunter who had discovered him, and, not without anxiety, whistling to his Yorza. "And you, Mikhail Nikanoruitch?" he asked, turning to the "little uncle."

The "little uncle" came up with a frown.

"Why should I meddle? It's your game!—here's a how-de-do!—why, your dogs cost a whole village! Thousand-ruble dogs! You two match yours, and I will look on! Rugai! Na! na!" he cried. "Rugaïushka!" he added; involuntarily expressing by this endearing diminutive the hope that he placed upon his red hound.

Natasha could see and feel the excitement which these two old men and her brother tried vainly to conceal, and she herself was even more excited.

The huntsman on the hillock still stood with upraised whipstock; the gentlemen approached him at a footpace. The harriers, coming up to the same horizon, dashed off in the direction of the hare; the hunters, but not the gentlemen, also hastened after them. The whole movement was made slowly, and in due form.

"Which way is he heading?" asked Nikolai, coming within a hundred paces of the hunter that had discovered him. But the beater had no time to reply, ere the gray hare, scenting the frost of the coming morn, was up and away. The harriers, still in leash, dashed with a howl down the slope after the hare: from all sides, the greyhounds, unleashed, dashed after the harriers and the hare. All these slowly stirring hunting attendants, shouting "stoř" (stay) to keep the dogs on the right scent, and the greyhound-keepers crying "atoo," to urge them on, swept across the field. Ilagin, with perfect coolness, Nikolai, Natasha, and the "little uncle" flew along, not heeding how or whither they were going, with only the dogs and the hare in their eyes, and fearing only lest they should for a single instant lose the course of the hunt from sight.

The hare proved to be full grown and full of game. After springing out, he did not on the instant dash away, but cocked up his ears, listening to the shouts of the men, and the trampling of the horses, suddenly closing in upon him from all sides. He made a dozen springs, in no great haste, letting the hounds come quite close to him; and then, finally, having chosen his course, and realized his danger, he laid back his ears and was off like the wind. His form had been in the stubble; but the course he took was toward the meadow-lands, where it was marshy. Two dogs, answering to the hunter who had discovered him, were the first to see the hare, and lay for him; but they were still a considerable distance behind when Ilagin's red-spotted Yorza outstripped them, came within a dog's length of him, sprang on him with frightful violence, snapped at the hare's tail, and, supposing that she had him, rolled over and over.

The hare, arching his back, darted off at a sharper pace than ever. Then the black-spotted Milka, broad of beam, dashed swiftly in front of Yorza, and began to gain on the hare.

"Milushka!—little mother!"—rang out Nikolai's encouraging shout. It seemed as if Milka were just going to overtake and nip the hare, but she went too far, and went beyond. The hare had stopped short.
Again the pretty little Yorza came to the fore and seemed to hang over the hare's very tail, as if she were measuring the distance, so as not to be deceived again, before she should seize him by the hind leg.

"Yorzanka!—little sister!"—rang out Ilagin's voice, unnaturally, and as if choked with tears. Yorza heeded not his prayer; at the very instant that she might have been expected to seize her game, he swerved off and bowled away along the ridge, between the meadow and the stubble. Again Yorza and Milka, like two little pole-horses, dashed off neck and neck after the game; but this middle ground was better running for the hare, and the dogs did not gain on him so rapidly.

"Rugaï! Rugaiushka! here's a how-de-do!" cried still a third voice at this instant; and Rugai, the "little uncle's" red, crook-backed hound, stretching out and doubling up his back, was seen catching up with the two other hounds, dashing beyond them, and falling, with terrible self-control, on the hare itself. He flung him from the stubble-ground into the meadow, leaped on him even more fiercely a second time, in the muddy marsh, into which he sank up to the knees; and then all that could be seen was that he rolled over and over with the hare, the mud staining his back.

The "star" of dogs clustered round them. In a minute the party gathered in a circle round the clustering dogs. The "little uncle," radiant and happy, alone dismounted, and cut off the hare's hind foot. Shaking the hare, so that the blood would drip off, he looked around excitedly; with wandering eyes, unable to keep his feet and hands quiet; and spoke, not knowing what he said, or whom he addressed.

"That's the kind of a how-de-do! That's a dog for you! Worth all of your thousand-ruble hounds! Here's a how-de-do!" said he, all out of breath, and fiercely glancing around, as if he were berating some one; as if all of them were his foes, and all had insulted him, and now, at last, he had come to his chance for getting even with them. "Look at your thousand-ruble dogs! Here's a how-de-do! Here, Rugai, here's the foot!" he cried, flinging him the hare's paw, with the mud still clinging to it: "You've earned it—here's a how-de-do!"

"She'd run herself all out: she cornered him thrice, all by herself," said Nikolai, likewise not heeding any one, and not minding whether any one listened to him or not.

"That was a great way; he seized him by the back!" exclaimed Ilagin's groom.

"Yes, when she's run him out, of course, any house-dog could grip him!" said Ilagin at the same instant; he was flushed, and what with the mad gallop, and the excitement, could scarcely draw his breath. Natasha, so great was her excitement and enthusiasm, also was screaming at the top of her lungs, and shrilly enough to make one's ears ring. With these shrieks of delight, she expressed what all the other sportsmen were expressing by their simultaneous exclamations. And these shrieks were so odd, that she would have been constrained to feel ashamed of herself, and all the others would have been amazed at it, if it had been at any other time.

The "little uncle" himself doubled up the hare cleverly, and boldly laid him over the crupper of his horse, as if, by this action, he were defying them all; and he mounted his fallow bay, and rode away, acting as if he had no wish to speak to any one.

All the rest, melancholy and disconsolate, separated; and it was only after some time had elapsed, that they recovered their former state of affected indifference. For some time, still, they gazed after the red, humped-back Rugai; who, all spattered with mud, rattling his chain, trotted after the "little uncle's" horse, with the supercilious aspect of a victor.

'You see I am like all the rest of you, as long as there is no game to be after. Yes, and you had better keep at a respectful distance!' was what the aspect of this dog seemed to Nikolai to say.

When, after some time, the "little uncle" rode back to Nikolai, and began to talk with him, Nikolai felt flattered that, after what had taken place, the "little uncle" was condescending enough to talk with him!
CHAPTER VII

When, late in the afternoon, Ilagin courteously took his departure, Nikolai found that they were so far from home that he was glad to accept the "little uncle's" proposition that their hunting party should spend the night at his little estate at Mikhailovko.

"Now if you should come to my place—here's a how-de-do!"—said the "little uncle," "that would be the best way: you see the weather is wet," added the "little uncle." "You could get rested; and the little countess can be driven home in a drozhsky."

The proposition was accepted; a huntsman was sent to Otradnoye, after the drozhsky, while Nikolai, Natasha, and Petya went to the "little uncle's."

Five men, big and little,—the "little uncle's" house serfs,—rushed out on the front doorsteps, to welcome their barin home. A dozen women, of every age and size, thrust their heads out of the back porch to stare at the approaching cavalcade.

The appearance of Natasha—a woman, a barninya—on horseback aroused the curiosity of the "little uncle's" household serfs to such a pitch that several of them, undeterred by her presence, approached her, stared at her, and freely made their observations, as if she were some curiosity on exhibition, and not a human being who could hear and understand what they said.

"Arinka, just ye look: she sits sidewise! Yes, sidewise; and her skirt dangles!.... And just see her horn!"

"Holy saints preserve us! and a knife too!".....

"She's a real Tatar!"

"How is it you do not get thrown off?" asked the most audacious of them, turning directly to Natasha.

The "little uncle" dismounted from his horse at the doorsteps of his small country residence, which was built in the midst of an overgrown garden; and, glancing round on his domestics, he gave an imperative order for the supernumeraries to clear out, and for everything to be done necessary for the reception of his guests and the hunting train.

There was a general scattering. The "little uncle" helped Natasha to dismount, and, giving her his hand, led her up the precarious deal steps. The house, which was not plastered, and showed the rough timbers of the walls, was not remarkable for its cleanliness; it was plain to see that the inmates did not consider it the first duty of life to remove every trace of a spot, but there was no noticeable neglect. The entry was filled with the odor of fresh apples, and hung with the skins of wolves and foxes.

The "little uncle" conducted his guests through the antechamber into a small dining-room, with a folding table and red-painted chairs; thence into the drawing-room, where there were a round pine table and a divan; and finally into the library, where there were a ragged divan, a well-worn carpet, and portraits of Suvorof, of the proprietor's father and mother, and of himself in military uniform. The library smelt strong of tobacco and dogs.

Here the "little uncle" begged his guests to be seated and make themselves quite at home, and he left them. Rugaï, his back still covered with mud, came into the room, lay down on the divan, and began to clean himself with tongue and teeth. From the library led a corridor, in which could be seen a screen with its hangings full of rents; beyond the screen were heard the laughing and chatter of women.

Natasha, Nikolai, and Petya threw off their wraps, and sat down on the divan. Petya rested his head on his arm, and was instantly asleep. Natasha and Nikolai sat in silence. Their faces were flushed; they were very hungry, and in very good spirits. They exchanged glances; after the hunting was over and they were in the house, Nikolai no longer considered it necessary to display his masculine superiority over his sister. Natasha winked at her brother; and both, after trying to restrain themselves for a moment, burst forth in a short and hearty peal of laughter, without even taking time to think what they were laughing at.

After a short absence, the "little uncle" came in, dressed in a Cossack coat, blue trousers, and short boots. And Natasha felt that this costume, which, to her amusement and amazement, she had seen the "little uncle" wear at Otradnoye, was a perfectly proper costume, in no respect worse than frock-coat or swallow-tail. The "little uncle" was also in the best of spirits: he was not only not offended by the brother's and sister's merriment,—it never entered into his head that they were laughing at his mode of life,—but he even joined in with their apparently causeless laughter.

"Well, the little countess is so young—here's a how-de-do!—never saw another like her!" he exclaimed, giving Rostof a long-stemmed pipe, and clutching another with a carved short stem between his three fingers, as his habit was.

"All day riding, just like a man, and as if it were quite the ordinary thing."

Shortly after the "little uncle" rejoined them, the door was opened by a young girl, apparently barefooted, to judge by the noiselessness of her tread; and in came a portly, ruddy-faced, handsome woman of forty, with double chin and full red lips, bearing in her hands a huge tray set out with dishes. With overpowering hospitality, dignity, and politeness beaming from her eyes, and expressed in her every motion, she contemplated the guests, and with a flattering smile made them a most respectful courtesy. In spite of her rather unusual portliness, which made bosom and abdomen unduly prominent, and caused her to hold her head very high, this woman, who was the "little uncle's" ekonomka, or housekeeper, moved about with amazing agility. She walked up to the table, set down the tray, and skilfully, with her white, plump hands, removed and arranged on the table the bottles and various dishes comprising the zakuska or lunch. Having done this, she started away and stood by the door, with a smile on her face.

"That is the kind of a woman I am! Now, do you understand the "little uncle"?' her attitude seemed to Rostof to imply. How could he fail to understand? Not only Rostof, but even Natasha, understood the "little uncle," and the meaning of his furrowed brows, and the happy, self-satisfied smile which slightly curved his lips as Anisya Feodorovna entered the room. On the tray were travnik or herb brandy, liqueurs, mushroom, wheat-flour cakes with buttermilk, fresh honeycomb, mulled wine and sparkling mead, apples, raw nuts, roasted nuts, and nuts cooked in honey. Then Anisya Feodorovna brought fruits preserved in honey and sugar, and a ham and a fowl just roasted.

All this was of Anisya Feodorovna's own preparation, and selecting, and setting forth. All this was redolent of Anisya Feodorovna, and had the mark of her genius and taste. All was in character with her scrupulous neatness, and cleanness, and whiteness, and her pleasant smile.

"Have a bite of something to eat, little countess," she insisted, handing Natasha first one thing and then another. Natasha partook of everything; and it seemed to her that she had never seen and never tasted such buttermilk cakes, or mulled wine with such a flavor, or nuts cooked so deliciously in honey, or such a fowl!

Anisya Feodorovna went out. Rostof and the "little uncle," while sipping their glasses of cherry liqueur, talked about hunting, past and to come, about Rugaï, and Ilagin's dogs. Natasha, with shining eyes, sat up erect on the divan, and listened to them. Several times she tried to rouse Petya to have something to eat; but he muttered incoherent words, and was evidently too sound asleep. Natasha felt so happy, she so keenly enjoyed the novel surroundings, that her only fear was that the drozhsky would come for her too soon. After one of those fortuitous silences that are almost inevitable with people who for the first time entertain their friends at home, the "little uncle," responding to a thought that must have occurred to his guests, remarked:

"And this is the way I shall live out my days. You die—here's a how-de-do!—and nothing is left. So what's the sin?"

The "little uncle's" face had grown very grave, and even handsome, as he made this remark. Rostof could not help thinking of the pleasant things his father and the neighbors had said of the old man. The "little uncle," throughout the whole government, had the reputation of being as noble-hearted and disinterested as he was eccentric. He was often called upon to act as arbiter in family disputes, he was chosen executor of wills, he was made the repository of secrets, he was elected judge, and called upon to fill other offices; but he stubbornly refused to enter active service: autumn and spring he rode about the country on his fallow bay stallion; in the winter he stayed at home; in the summer he lounged in his overgrown garden.

"Why don't you enter the service, 'little uncle'?"

"I have served and I've given it up. It is no use—here's a how-de-do!—I can't make anything out of it. It's well enough for you youngsters, but my wits could never grasp it. But hunting! That's quite another thing! That's the how-de-do! Open that door, there!" he cried. "What did you shut it for?"

The door at the end of the corridor—which the "little uncle" called "collidor"—led into a single room occupied by the hunting train. The bare feet swiftly slithered along, and an invisible hand pushed the door open into the "hunters' room," as this was called. The sounds of the balalaïka, or Ukraine guitar, were clearly heard through the corridor; some one who was a master hand at playing it evidently had hold of the instrument. It had been a long time since Natasha had listened to these sounds, and now she ran out into the corridor to hear more distinctly.

"That is Mitka, my coachman. I bought a beautiful balalaïka for him, I'm fond of it," said the "little uncle." After coming back from his courses, the "little uncle" was in the habit of summoning Mitka into the "hunters' room" to play for him. The "little uncle" liked that kind of music.
"How good it is! It's excellent!" said Nikolai, with a slight trace of involuntary scorn, as if he were ashamed of himself for confessing that he extremely enjoyed such sounds.

"Excellent!" repeated Natasha, reproachfully; she was conscious of the tone in which her brother spoke. "Excellent does not express it: it’s charming, that’s what it is!"

Just as the "little uncle's" pickled mushrooms, the hydromel, and the liqueur seemed to her the best in the world, so also did that tune on the balalaika seem to her, at that moment, the very acme of all musical charm.

"Again, please, again," cried Natasha at the door, as soon as the sounds of the balalaika had ceased. Mitka tuned the instrument, and once more began bravely to thrum out the Baruiinya, or "The High-born Maid," with a clanging of strings and grappling of chords. The "little uncle" sat and listened, inclining his head to one side with an almost imperceptible smile. The theme of the Baruiinya was repeated a hundred times. Several times the balalaika had to be tuned, and then once more the same sounds trembled forth; and yet the listeners were not wearied, and wanted to hear this tune over and over again. Anisya Feodorovna came in, and leaned her portly frame against the door-lintel.

"Be kind enough to listen to him," said she to Natasha, with a smile strikingly like the "little uncle's." "He plays for us gloriously!" said she.

"That part is not done right!" suddenly exclaimed the "little uncle," with an energetic gesture. "It needs to be faster there—here's a how-de-do!—let it out!"....

"And do you know how to play?" asked Natasha. The "little uncle" smiled, but made no reply.

"Just you look, Anisyushya, if the strings are all on my guitar. I have not had it in my hands for some time—here's a how-de-do!"

Anisya Feodorovna gladly went to fulfil her lord and master's command, and immediately brought the guitar.

The "little uncle," not looking at any one, blew off the dust, rapped with his bony fingers on the sounding-board of the guitar, tuned the strings, and straightened himself on his chair. He grasped the guitar above the finger-board, with a somewhat theatrical air, pushing back his left elbow; and, with a wink toward Anisya Feodorovna, he struck up, not the Baruinya, but a prelude of one clear, ringing chord; after which he began in a steady and precise, but still regularly accentuated tempo, to improvise variations on the well-known song, "On the pa-a-vement o-of the street."

At once the theme of the song began to sing itself rhythmically in the hearts of both Nikolai and Natasha, with that peculiar sedate cheerfulness which Anisya Feodorovna's whole being exhaled. Anisya Feodorovna blushed, and, hiding her face in her handkerchief, she left the room with a laugh. The "little uncle" went on improvising on the song clearly, carefully, and with energetic steadiness, his glance, full of varying inspiration, fixed on the spot where Anisya Feodorovna had been standing. There was a barely perceptible something, betokening amusement, at one corner of his mouth, under his gray mustache; and this look intensified as the song went on, or as the accent grew more pronounced, and in such places as the strings almost snapped under his twanging fingers.

"Charming! charming, 'little uncle'! Some more, some more!" cried Natasha, as soon as he came to a pause. Then, springing up from her seat, she threw her arms around the "little uncle" and kissed him.

"Nikolenka! Nikolenka!" he cried, glancing at her brother, and, as it were, asking him if he appreciated it all.

Nikolai also was greatly delighted with the performance. The "little uncle" once more struck up a tune. Anisya Feodorovna's smiling face again appeared in the doorway, and behind her were grouped still other faces.
was the tune which the "little uncle" played. Then he made one more skilful change of key, broke off, and shrugged his shoulders.

"There, there, 'little uncle!' you old darling!" murmured Natasha, in such a tone of entreaty that one might have thought her life was dependent on its gratification. The "little uncle" stood up, and as if there were two men,—the one smiling a grave smile at the merry one, while the merry one performed a naïve and dignified antic in anticipation of the plyaska, or native dance.

"Now, then, my dear niece," cried the "little uncle," waving his hand toward Natasha, after striking a chord.

Natasha threw off the shawl which she had wrapped around her, glided out in front of the "little uncle," and, putting her arms akimbo, made a motion with her shoulders, and waited.

Where, how, when, had this little countess, educated as she had been by a French émigrée, imbibed the Russian spirit? Was it from the very atmosphere which she breathed? Where had she learned all those characteristic motions which the pas de châle might long ago have been supposed entirely to efface?

But the spirit and the motions were the very ones—inimitable, untaught, intuitive, thoroughly Russian—which the "little uncle" expected of her. The moment she got to her feet, with an enthusiastic, proud, and shrewdly gay smile, the first tremor of fear which seized Nikolai and all the other spectators—the fear that she might not be able to perform it correctly—passed away, and gave place to sheer admiration.

Her performance was so absolutely perfect, and so entirely what was expected of her, that Anisya Feodorovna, who had immediately handed to her the handker-

---

1 "At the crystal-flowing fountain
Cries a voice, 'O maiden, wait!'

2 Galushchik.
chief that played such an indispensable part in the dance, wept and laughed at once, as she gazed at that slender, graceful countess, from another world, as it were, educated in silks and velvets, who could understand all that was in herself—Anisya; in Anisya's father, Feodor; and in her aunt, and in her mother, and in the whole Russian people.

"Well, little countess—here's a how-de-do!" exclaimed the "little uncle," with a radiant smile, when the plyaska was finished. "Well done, niece! Now, all we need is to pick you out a fine young husband—here's a how-de-do!"

"Already picked out," said Nikolai, smiling.

"Oho!" exclaimed the "little uncle," in surprise, with a questioning look at Natasha. Natasha, with a smile of pleasure, nodded her head in assent.

"And he's such a fine one!" said she.

But the moment these words had escaped her lips, a new train of thoughts and feelings arose in her mind: what signified Nikolai's smile when he said, "Already picked out?" "Is he glad or sorry? Possibly he thinks that my Bolkonsky would not approve, would not understand, this gayety of ours. No, he certainly would not understand it all.... Where is he now, I wonder?" said Natasha to herself, and her face grew suddenly grave. But it lasted only a single second. "You must not think about it, you must not dare to think about it," said she to herself; and, with her face wreathed in smiles, she again sat down beside the "little uncle," and urged him to play something more.

The "little uncle" played still another song and waltz; then, after a short silence, he cleared his throat, and struck up his favorite hunting-song:—

"Kak so vetchera porosha Vuiipadala khorosha."1

The "little uncle" sang as the people sing, with that full and naïve conviction that the whole meaning of the

1 "As the evening sun sank low Fell the white and beauteous snow."
song is to be found exclusively in the words; that the tune will go of itself, and that there is no special air, or that the air is merely for harmony's sake. The result was that this singing of the "little uncle's," so completely free from self-consciousness, like the songs of the birds, was particularly charming. Natasha was in raptures over his singing. She determined that she would not take any more lessons on the harp, but would henceforth play only on the guitar. She asked the "little uncle" to let her take the instrument, and immediately began to pick out chords for singing.

About ten o'clock a lineika, or long, low carriage, and a drozhsky came for Natasha and Petya, and three mounted men, who had been sent to find them. The count and countess did not know what had become of them, and, as the messenger reported, were in a great state of agitation.

Petya was picked up and deposited in the lineika, like a dead body; Natasha and Nikolai took their places in the drozhsky. The "little uncle" muffled Natasha all up, and bade her farewell with a new and peculiar touch of affection. He accompanied them on foot as far as the bridge, which they had to abandon for the ford, and he commanded his hunters to precede them with lanterns.

"Good-by, prashchaï, — my dear niece," rang his voice from out the darkness — not the one which Natasha had known hitherto, but the one that had sung, "As the evening sun sank low."

The windows in the village through which they passed gleamed with ruddy lights, and there was a cheerful odor of smoke.

"How charming the 'little uncle' is!" exclaimed Natasha, as they bowled along the highway.

"Yes," said Nikolai. "You are not cold, are you?"

"No, I'm comfortable, perfectly comfortable. Oh, I'm so happy!" replied Natasha, with a sense of perplexity. They rode for a long time in silence.

The night was dark and damp. They could not even see the horses; they could only hear them splashing through the unseen mud-puddles.

What was going on in that girl’s impressionable mind, which was so quick to catch and retain the most varied experiences of life? How was it possible to stow them all away in it? But she was very happy. As they drew near the house, she suddenly struck up the song, “As the evening sun sank low,” the tune of which she had been trying all the way to catch, and at last succeeded in remembering.

“You’ve caught it, have you?” said Nikolai.

“What were you thinking about just now, Nikolenka?” asked Natasha. They were fond of asking each other this question.

“I?” exclaimed Nikolai, trying to recollect; “let me see! At first, I was thinking that Rugai, the red hound, was like the ‘little uncle’; and that, if he had been a man, he would keep the ‘little uncle’ about him all the time; if not for hunting, at least for his music; at all events, I would have kept him. How musical the ‘little uncle’ is! Is n’t he? Well, and what were your thoughts?”

“Mine? Wait! wait! At first, I was thinking how we were riding here, and that we supposed we were on our way home; whereas, in reality, it is so dark that God only knows where we are going; and we might suddenly discover that we were not at Otradnoye at all, but in some fairy realm! And then I was thinking.... no, there was nothing else!”

“I know! you certainly were thinking about him,” said Nikolai, smiling, as Natasha knew by the tone of his voice.

“No,” replied Natasha, though in reality she had been thinking about Prince Andrei, and wondering how he would have liked the “little uncle.” “And there’s one thing I have been repeating and repeating all the way,” said Natasha, “and that is, ‘How superbly Anisyushka marched about!’ ” And Nikolai heard her clear, merry laugh, so easily excited by trifles. “But do you know,” she suddenly added, “I am certain that I shall never, never again be so happy, so free from care, as I am now!"

"What rubbish, nonsense, trumpery talk!" exclaimed Nikolai; and he thought in his own mind, "How charming this Natasha of mine is! I shall never find another friend like her! Why should she think of getting married? We might travel all over the world together!"

"How charming this dear Nikolai is!" thought Natasha. "Ah! there's a light in the drawing-room still," said she, pointing to the windows of the mansion, cheerfully shining out into the moist, velvety darkness of the night.

CHAPTER VIII

Count Ilya Andreyitch had resigned his position as predvodityel, or marshal of the district nobility, because this office entailed too great expenses. But still his finances showed no improvement.

Often Natasha and Nikolai found their parents engaged in secret, anxious consultation; and they heard rumors about the sale of the magnificent ancestral home of the Rostofs, and their pod-Moskovnaya estate. Now that he was relieved from this office, it was not necessary for them to entertain so extensively, and life at Otradnoye went on more quietly than in former years; but the huge mansion, and the wings, were just as full of servants as ever, and more than twenty persons habitually sat down at table. And all these were the regular household, who lived there, practically members of the family; or those who were obliged, for some reason or other, to live at the count's expense. Such, for instance, were Dimmler, the music-master, and his wife; Vogel, the dancing-master, and his whole family; then, an elderly lady of quality,¹ named Bielova, who had her home there; and many others of the same sort: Petya's tutors and governors, the young ladies' former "guvernantka," and men and women who simply found it better, or more to their advantage, to live at the count’s than at home.

¹ Baruinya.

They had not quite as much company as formerly; but the scale of living was practically the same, for the count and the countess found it impossible to accommodate themselves to any other.

The hunting establishment was the same, nay, it had even been increased by Nikolai: there were still fifty horses and fifteen coachmen in the stables; rich gifts on name-days were still given, and formal dinners, to which all the neighborhood were invited; the count still had his whist and Boston parties, at which, as he held his cards spread out so that every one could see them, his neighbors were enabled to go away enriched to the extent of several hundred rubles, every day, having come to regard it as an especial prerogative of theirs to make up a table at which Count Ilya Andreyitch should serve as their chief source of income.

The count marched along through the monstrous tangle of his affairs, striving not to believe that he was so involved, and at every step involving himself more and more, and feeling conscious that he had not the strength to rend the bonds that beset his feet, or the zeal and patience required to unravel them.

The countess, with her loving heart, was conscious that their fortunes were going to rack and ruin; but she felt that the count was blameless; that he could not help being what he was; that he himself was suffering,—though he tried to conceal it,—from the consciousness of the ruin that faced himself and his family, and was striving to devise means of rescue.

From her woman’s point of view, the only means that presented itself was to get Nikolai married to a wealthy heiress.

She felt that this was their last hope; and that if Nikolai refused a certain match, which she proposed to arrange for him, it would be necessary to bid a final farewell to every hope of restoring their fortunes. This match was with Julie Karagina, the daughter of a most worthy and virtuous father and mother; a girl whom the Rostofs had known since she was a child, and who had lately come into a large fortune, by the death of the last of her brothers.

The countess had written directly to Madame Karagina, in Moscow, proposing a marriage between daughter and son; and she had received a most favorable response. Madame Karagina replied that she, for her part, was agreed; but that everything depended on her daughter’s inclinations. Madame Karagina invited Nikolai to come to Moscow.

Several times the countess, with tears in her eyes, told her son that now, since both of her daughters were provided for, her sole desire was to see him married. She declared that she would go to her grave contented, if this might be. Then she said that she happened to know of a very lovely young girl; and she wanted to know his ideas upon the subject.

On other occasions, she openly praised Julie, and advised Nikolai to go to Moscow and have a good time during the Christmas holidays. Nikolai was sharp enough to understand his mother’s covert hints; and, during one of their talks, he managed to draw her out completely.

She told him that their whole hope of bringing their affairs into order was in seeing him married to the Karagina.

“But what if I loved a girl who was poor, maman, would you insist upon my sacrificing my feelings and honor, for money?” he asked, not realizing the harshness of his question, and simply desiring to show his noble feelings.

“No, you don’t understand me,” said his mother, not knowing how to set herself straight. “You misunderstood me, entirely, Nikolenka. All I desire is your happiness,” she added; and she had the consciousness that she had not spoken the truth, that she was getting beyond her depth. She burst into tears.

“Mamenka! don’t cry; simply tell me that this is your real wish, and you know that I would give my whole life—everything that I have—to make you happy," said Nikolai. "I would sacrifice everything for you, even my dearest wishes."

But the countess had no desire to offer the dilemma: she had no wish to demand a sacrifice from her son; she would have preferred herself to be the one who should make the sacrifice.

"No, no, you did not understand me; we won't say anything more about it," said she, wiping away her tears.

"Yes, perhaps it is true, that I am in love with a penniless girl," said Nikolai to himself. "Why should I sacrifice my sentiments and my honor, for the sake of wealth! I am amazed that mamenka should say such a thing to me! Is there any reason, because Sonya is poor, that I should not love her?" he asked himself, "that I should not return her true, generous love? And, most certainly, I should be much happier with her, than with such a doll as Julie! I can always sacrifice my feelings for my parents' good," said he to himself. "But to command my feelings is beyond my power. If I love Sonya, then my feeling is more powerful, and above everything for me."

Nikolai did not go to Moscow. The countess did not again revert to her conversation with him about his marriage; but she saw with pain, and even with indignation, the signs of a constantly growing intimacy between her son and the dowerless Sonya. She reproached herself, but she found it impossible to resist heaping worriments upon Sonya, and finding fault with her: oftentimes unreasonably stopping her short, and addressing her with the formal vui, "you," and "moya milaya," instead of by the usual tenderer epithets. What annoyed the worthy countess most of all was that this poor, dark-eyed niece of hers was so sweet, so gentle, so humbly grateful for all her kindnesses; and so genuinely, unchangeably, and self-sacrificingly in love with Nikolai, that it was impossible to find anything really to blame her for.

Nikolai stayed at home, waiting till his leave of absence should expire.

A letter was received about this time from Natasha's lover, Prince Andrei, dated at Rome; it was his fourth. In it he wrote that he should long ere that have been on the way home to Russia, had it not been that the warmth of the climate had unexpectedly caused his wound to reopen, which obliged him to postpone his journey till the beginning of the next year.

Natasha was deeply in love with her "bridegroom"; her character had been greatly modified by this love; at the same time, her nature was thoroughly open to all the joys of life; but toward the end of the fourth month of their separation, she began to suffer from attacks of melancholy, which she found it impossible to resist. She was sick to death of herself; she grieved because all this time was slipping away so uselessly; while she felt that she was only too ready to love and to be loved. It was far from cheerful at the Rostofs'.

CHAPTER IX

The Christmas holidays had come, and except for the High Mass, except for the formal and perfunctory congratulations of the neighbors and the household servants, except for the new gowns that every one had on, there was nothing that especially signalized the season; though the perfectly still atmosphere, with the thermometer at twenty degrees\(^1\) below zero, the sun shining dazzlingly all day long, and at night the wintry sky glittering with myriads of stars, seemed to imply that nature at least gave special distinction to the Christmastide.

After dinner on the third day of the Christmas holidays, all the household had scattered to their respective rooms. It was the most tedious time of the day. Nikolai, who had been out in the morning, making calls on the neighbors, was asleep in the divan-room. The old count was resting in his library. Sonya was sitting at the center-table in the drawing-room copying some designs. The countess was laying out her game of patience. Nastasya Ivanovna, the buffoon, with a woe-begone countenance, was sitting at the window with two old ladies.

\(^1\) Réaumur.

Natasha came into the room, and went directly up to Sonya, looked at what she was doing, then stepped across to her mother and stood by her without saying a word.

"Why are you wandering about like a homeless spirit?" asked her mother. "What do you want?"

"I want him... instantly! this very minute! I want him," said Natasha, with gleaming eyes, but without a trace of a smile.

The countess raised her head and gave her daughter a steady look.

"Don't look at me! Don't look at me, mamma; I shall cry if you do!"

"Sit down, sit down with me here," said the countess.

"Mamma, I must have him. Why am I perishing so, mamma?"

Her voice broke; the tears started to her eyes, and in order to hide them she quickly turned away and left the room.

She went into the divan-room, stood there a moment lost in thought, and went to the maids' sitting-room. There, an elderly chambermaid was scolding a young girl, who had just come in from out of doors all out of breath.

"You might play some other time," the old servant was saying. "There is a time for all things."

"Let her be, Kondratyevna," said Natasha. "Run, Mavrusha, run."

And having rescued Mavrusha, Natasha went through the ball-room into the anteroom. An old man and two young lackeys were playing cards. They stopped their game, and respectfully stood up as their young mistress came in.

"What shall I have them do?" wondered Natasha. "Yes, Nikita, please go.... where shall I send him? oh, yes.... go into the barnyard and fetch me a cock; yes, and you, Misha, bring me some oats."
"Do you wish a few oats?" asked Misha, with joyous readiness.

"Go, go, make haste," said the old man, imperiously.

"And you, Feodor, get me a piece of chalk."

As she went past the butler's pantry, she ordered the samovar to be got ready, although it was not anywhere near the time for it.

Foka, the bufetchik, or butler, was the most morose man of all the household. Natasha took it into her head to try her power over him. He suspected that she was not in earnest, and began to ask her if she meant it.

"Oh, what a baruishnya she is!" said Foka, pretending to be very cross at Natasha.

No one in the house set so many feet flying, and no one gave the servants so much to do, as Natasha. She could not have any peace of mind if she saw servants, unless she sent them on some errand. It seemed as if she were making experiments whether she would not meet with angry answers or with grumbling, on the part of some of them, but the servants obeyed no one else so willingly as Natasha.

"Now, what shall I do? Where shall I go?" pondered the young countess, as she slowly passed along the corridor.

"Natasya Ivanovna, what sort of children shall I have?" she demanded of the buffoon, who, dressed in his woman's short jacket, was coming towards her.

"Oh, you will have fleas, dragon-flies, and grasshoppers!" replied the buffoon.

"My God! my God! it's this everlasting sameness! What shall I do with myself? Where can I find something to do?" and, swiftly kicking her heels together, she ran up-stairs to the quarters occupied by Vogel and his wife. Two governesses were sitting in the Vogels' room; on the table stood plates with raisins, walnuts, and almonds. The governesses were discussing the question whether it were cheaper to live in Moscow or Odessa.
Natasha sat down, listened to their conversation with a grave, thoughtful face, and then stood up.

"The Island of Madagascar!" she exclaimed. "Madagascar," she repeated, laying a special emphasis on each syllable; and then, without replying to Madame Schoss's question what she said, she hastened from the room.

Petya, her brother, was also up-stairs; he and his tutor were arranging for some fireworks which they were going to set off that night.

"Petya! Petka!" she cried to him. "Carry me down-stairs!"

Petya ran to her and bent his back. She jumped upon it, threw her arms around his neck, and he, with a hop, skip, and jump, started to run down with her.

"No, thank you! that will do! The Island of Madagascar!" she repeated, and jumping off, she flew downstairs.

Having made the tour of her dominions, as it were, having made trial of her power of command, and discovered that all were sufficiently obedient, but that everything was nevertheless utterly stupid, Natasha went into the ball-room, took the guitar, sat down in a dark corner behind a cabinet, and began to thrum the bass strings of her guitar, practising a theme which she remembered from an opera she had heard at Petersburg in company with Prince Andrei.

To those who were outside listening to her as she strummed on the guitar there seemed to be no sense to what she was playing, but in her imagination these sounds aroused from the dead past a whole series of recollections. As she sat in the shadow of the cabinet, with her eyes fixed on the pencil of light that streamed from the door of the butler's pantry, she listened to herself, and indulged in day-dreams. She was in the mood for day-dreaming.

Sonya, with a wine-glass in her hand, passed through the ball-room on her way to the butler's pantry. Natasha looked at her, at the bright chink in the door; and it seemed to her that on some occasion, long before, she had seen the light streaming through the chink in the pantry door, and Sonya crossing the room with a glass.

"Yes, and it was exactly the same!" said Natasha to herself. "What is this tune, Sonya?" cried Natasha, moving her fingers over the bass strings.

"Ah! Are you here?" cried Sonya, startled at first, and then stopping to listen. "I don't know. Isn't it 'The Storm'?" she suggested timidly, for fear that she was mistaken.

"Now, there! she gave a start in exactly the same way, she came up to me in exactly the same way, and her face wore the same timid smile when that took place," thought Natasha. "And in just the same way I felt that there was something lacking in her.—No! that is the chorus from the 'Water Carrier.' You ought to know!"

And Natasha hummed the air over to recall it to Sonya's memory.

"Where were you going?" asked Natasha.

"To change the water in this glass. I am just copying a sketch."

"You are always busy; and here am I, not good for anything," said Natasha. "Where is Nikolai?"

"Asleep, I think!"

"Sonya, do go and wake him up," urged Natasha. "Tell him that I want him to sing."

She remained sitting there, and wondering why it was that this had happened so; but, as it did not disturb her very much that she was not able to solve this question, she once more relapsed into her recollections of the time when she was with him, and he looked at her with loving eyes.

"Akh! I wish he would come! I am so afraid that he won't come! But, worst of all, I'm growing old! that's a fact! Soon I shall not be what I am even now! But, maybe, he will come to-day. Maybe he is here now. Maybe he has come, and even now is sitting in the drawing-room. Maybe he came yesterday, and I have forgotten about it."

1 The Peasants' Chorus, third act of Cherubini's opera, "Les Deux Journées" (known also in Germany as "Der Wasserträger"), produced 1804.

She got up, laid down the guitar, and went into the drawing-room. All the household—tutors, governesses, and guests—were already gathered near the tea-table. The men were standing around the table; but Prince Andreï was not among them, and everything was as usual.

"Ah! there she is," said Count Ilya Andreyitch, as he saw Natasha. "Come here and sit by me!"

But Natasha remained standing near her mother, looking around as if she were in search of someone.

"Mamma!" she murmured. "Give him back to me, mamma, quick, quick!" and again she found it hard to keep from sobbing.

She sat down by the table, and listened to the conversation of her elders, and of Nikolaï, who had also come to the tea-table.

"My God! my God! the same faces, the same small-talk! even papa holds his cup and cools it with his breath just as he always does!" said Natasha, to her horror feeling a dislike rising in her against all the household because they were always the same.

After tea, Nikolaï, Sonya, and Natasha went into the divan-room, to their favorite corner, where they always held their most confidential conversations.

CHAPTER X

"Has it ever happened to you," asked Natasha of her brother, when they were comfortably settled in the divan-room, "has it ever happened to you that it seemed as if there were nothing, just nothing at all, left in the future for you? that all that was best was past, and that you were not so much bored as disgusted?"

"Have n't I, indeed! Many a time, when everything was going well, and all were gay, it would come into my head that it was all vanity and vexation of spirit, and that all of us would have to die. Once, at the regiment, I did not go out to promenade, though the band was playing, for everything had suddenly become so gloomy...."

"Akh! I know what you mean! I know! I know!" interrupted Natasha. "When I was a tiny bit of a girl, it used to be that way with me. Do you remember I was punished once, on account of those cherries, and you were all dancing, while I had to sit alone in the class-room, and sobbed? I shall never forget how melancholy I felt, and how vexed with you all and with myself! Oh, yes, vexed with you all! All of you! And the worst of it was, I was not to blame," said Natasha; "do you remember?"

"I remember," replied Nikolai; "and I remember that I went to you and wanted to comfort you; and, do you know, I was ashamed to do it! We were terribly absurd! I had at that time a kind of toy, like a manikin, and I wanted to give it to you! Do you remember?"

"And do you remember," asked Natasha, with a thoughtful smile, "how, once, a long, long time ago, when we were little tots, uncle took us into the library, — that was in the old house and it was dark, — and when we went in, suddenly there stood before us...."

"A negro!" said Nikolai, taking the word from her mouth, and laughing merrily. "Of course I remember it! And now I can't tell for the life of me that it was a negro, or whether we saw it in a dream, or whether it was something that we were told!"

"He had gray hair, you remember, and white teeth, and he stood and stared at us...."

"Do you remember it, Sonya?" asked Nikolai.

"Yes, I have a dim recollection of something about it," timidly replied the young girl.

"I have asked both papa and mamma about that negro," said Natasha. "They declare that no negro was ever here. But you see you remember about it!"

"Certainly I do! And now I recall his teeth very distinctly."
“How strange! Just as if it were in a dream! I like it!”

“And do you remember how we were rolling eggs in the dining-room, and suddenly two little old women appeared, and began to whirl round on the carpet. That was so, was n’t it? Do you remember how fine it was?”

“Yes; and do you remember how papenka, in a blue shuba, used to fire off his musket from the doorstep?”

Thus, smiling with delight, they took turns in calling up, not the reminiscences of a gloomy old age, but the recollections of the poetic days of youth; impressions from the most distant past, dreams fused and confused with reality; and these happy recollections sometimes made them quietly laugh.

Sonya, as usual, sat at a little distance from the other two, though their recollections were not confined to themselves alone. She did not remember much of what the others did, and what came back to her failed to arouse in her that poetic feeling which they experienced. She simply rejoiced in their enjoyment, and tried to take a part in it.

She began to feel a special interest in these reminiscences only when they came to speak of her first coming to their house. Sonya was telling how afraid she was of Nikolai, because he wore braid on his jacket; and her nurse told her that they were going to sew her up in braid.

“And I remember they told me that you were born under a cabbage,” said Natasha. “And I remember, also, that I did not dare to disbelieve it, though I knew that it was a fib, and so I felt uncomfortable.”

At this stage of the conversation, a chambermaid thrust her head into the divan-room, at the rear door, and said in a whisper: —

“Baruishnya, they have brought the cock.”

“I don’t want it, Polya, now; tell them to carry it away again.”

While they were still engaged in talking, Dimmler came into the divan-room, and went to the harp which stood in one corner. As he took off the covering, the harp gave forth a discordant sound.

"Eduard Karluitch, please play my favorite nocturne—that one by Monsieur Field," cried the old countess from the drawing-room.

Dimmler struck a chord, and, turning to Natasha, Nikolai, and Sonya, said, "Young people, how quiet you are sitting!"

"Yes, we are talking philosophy," said Natasha, looking up for an instant, and then pursuing the conversation. It now turned upon dreams.

Dimmler began to play. Natasha noiselessly went on her tiptoes to the table, took the candle, and carried it out; then she came back and sat down quietly in her place.

In the room, especially that part where the divan was on which they were sitting, it was dark, but through the lofty windows the silver light of the full moon fell across the floor.

"Do you know, I think," said Natasha, drawing closer to Nikolai and Sonya, when Dimmler had now finished his nocturne, and sat lightly thrumming the strings, apparently uncertain whether to cease, or to play something else,—"I think that when you go back, remembering, and remembering, and remembering everything, you remember so far back, that at last you remember what happened even before you were born."....

"That is metempsychosis," exclaimed Sonya, who always had been distinguished for her scholarship and her good memory. "The Egyptians used to believe that our souls once inhabited the bodies of animals, and will go into animals again."

"Ah, but do you know, I don't believe that we were ever in animals," remarked Natasha, in the same low voice, though the music had ceased. "But I know for certain that we used to be angels in that other world; and, when we come here, we remember about it."....

1John Field, known as "Russian Field," born in Dublin; pupil of Clementi; went from Paris to Germany, from Germany to Russia, where he died in January, 1837.
“May I join you?” asked Dimmler, coming up noiselessly, and taking a seat near them.

“If we were angels, then why have we fallen lower?” suggested Nikolai. “No, that can’t be!”

“Who told you that we are lower than the angels? Because I know what I used to be,” objected Natasha, with conviction. “You see the soul is immortal. ... If I am going to live always, it must be that I lived before, lived a whole eternity.”

“Yes, but it is hard for us to realize what eternity is,” remarked Dimmler, who, when he had joined the group of young people had worn a slightly scornful smile, but now spoke in as low and serious a tone as the rest.

“Why is it hard to realize eternity?” demanded Natasha. “After to-day comes to-morrow, and then the next day, and so on forever; and, in the same way, yesterday was, and then the day before.” ....

“Natasha! now it is your turn. Sing me something!” said the countess’s voice. “Why are you all sitting there, like conspirators?”

“Mamma! I don’t feel like it,” said Natasha; but, nevertheless, she got up.

Not one of them, not even Dimmler, who was no longer young, wanted to break off the conversation and leave the corner; but Natasha had arisen, and Nikolai took his place at the clavichord. Natasha, as usual, going to the center of the music-room, and, choosing the place where her voice sounded best, began to sing her mother’s favorite piece.

She had said that she did not feel like singing; but it was long since she had sung as she sang that evening, and long before she sang so well again. Count Ilya Andreyitch listened to it from his library, where he was closeted with Mitenka; and, like a school-boy in haste to go out to play as soon as his lessons are done, he stumbled over his words as he gave his instructions to his overseer, and finally stopped speaking; while Mitenka, also listening, stood silently in front of the count.

Nikolai did not take his eyes from his sister, and even breathed when she did. Sonya, as she listened, thought what a wide gulf there was between her and her friend, and how impossible it would be to find any one in the world so bewitchingly charming as her cousin. The old countess, with a smile of melancholy pleasure, and with tears in her eyes, sat occasionally shaking her head. She was thinking of Natasha, and of her own youthful days; and of that unnatural and terrible element that seemed to enter into this engagement of her daughter with Prince Andreï.

Dimmler, taking his seat next the countess, and covering his eyes, listened.

"No, countess," said he, finally, "this talent of hers is European; she has nothing to learn; such smoothness, sympathetic quality, power ...."

"Akh! How I tremble for her; how worried I am!" said the countess, not realizing to whom she was speaking. Her maternal instinct told her that Natasha had more in her than ordinary girls, and that this would result in unhappiness for her.

Natasha had not quite finished her singing, when fourteen-year-old Petya, all excitement, came running into the room with the news that some maskers had come.

Natasha abruptly stopped.

"Durak! idiot!" she cried to her brother, and, running to a chair, flung herself into it, and sobbed so that it was long before she could recover herself.

"It's nothing, mamenka; truly it's nothing; it was only Petya startled me," said she, striving to smile; but her tears still flowed, and her throat was choked by her repressed sobs.

The house servants, who had dressed themselves up as bears, Turks, tavern-keepers, fine ladies, monsters, and ogres, bringing in with them the outside cold and hilarity, at first shyly clustered together in the ante-room; but gradually, hiding one behind the other, they ventured into the ball-room; and at first, timidly, but afterwards with ever-increasing fervor and zeal, began to perform songs, dances, and khorovods, and other Christmas games.
The countess, after she had recognized them, and indulged in a hearty laugh at their antics, retired into the drawing-room. Count Ilya Andreyitch, with a radiant smile, took his seat in the ball-room, with approving glances at the masqueraders. Meantime, all the young folks had mysteriously disappeared.

Within half an hour, the other masqueraders in the ball-room were joined by an elderly baruinya, in farthingale, and this was Nikolaĭ; by a Turkish woman, and this was Petya; by a clown, this was Dimmler; by a hussar, Natasha; and by a Circassian youth, Sonya: both the girls had dark eyebrows and mustaches, contrived with the help of burnt cork.

After well-feigned surprise, and pretended lack of recognition, as well as praise, from those who were not mumming, the young people decided that their costumes were too good to be wasted, and that it was incumbent upon them to go and exhibit them elsewhere.

Nikolaĭ, who had a strong desire for a troika ride, the roads being in splendid condition, proposed that they should take with them the ten house serfs who were disguised, and that all should go and visit the "little uncle."

"No, he is an old man, and you will merely disturb him," expostulated the countess. "Why! you could n't all get into his house! If you must go somewhere, then go to the Melyukofs'."

Madame Melyukova was a widow, who, with a host of children of various ages, and with tutors and governesses, lived about four versts from the Rostofs'.

"There! ma chère, a good idea!" cried the old count, becoming greatly excited. "Wait till I can get into a costume and I will go with you. I tell you we will wake Pasheta up!"

But the countess was not at all inclined to let the old count go, since, for several days, his leg had been troubling him. It was therefore decided that it was not best for Ilya Andreyitch to go; but that if Luiza Ivanovna, that is to say, Madame Schoss, would act as chaperon, then the young ladies might also go to Melyukova's.

¹ Diminutive of Pelagaya.
Sonya, though generally very timid and shy, now was more urgent than all the others in her entreaties to Luiza Ivanovna not to disappoint them.

Sonya's costume was the best of all. Her mustache and dark brows were extremely becoming to her. All assured her that she was very handsome, and she was keyed up to a state of energy and excitement quite out of her usual manner. Some inner voice told her that now or never her fate was to be decided; and now, in her masculine garb, she seemed like another person. Luiza Ivanovna consented; and in less than half an hour, four troikas, with jingling bells on shaft-arch and harness, swept, creaking and crunching over the frosty snow, up to the front steps.

Natasha was the first to catch the tone of Christmas festivity, and this jollity was perfectly infectious, growing more and more noisy, and reaching the highest pitch as they all came out into the frosty air, and with shouting and calling, and laughing and screaming, took their places in the sledges.

Two of the three spans were unmatched; the third troika belonged to the old count, with a racer of the Orlof breed between the thills; the fourth was Nikolai's own private troika with a low, shaggy, black shaft-horse. Nikolai, in his old maid's costume, over which he threw his hussar's riding-cloak, fastened with a belt, took his place in the middle of his sledge, and gathered up the reins. It was so light that he could see the metal of the harness-plates shining in the moonbeams, and the horses' eyes, as they turned them anxiously toward the merry group gathered under the darkness of the porte-cochère.

In Nikolai's sledge were packed Natasha, Sonya, Madame Schoss, and two of the maid-servants; in the old count's went Dimmler, with his wife and Petya; in the others, the rest of the household serfs were disposed.

"You lead the way, Zakhar!" cried Nikolai, to his father's coachman; he wished to have a chance to "beat" him on the road.

The old count's troika, with Dimmler and the other masqueraders, creaked as if its runners were frozen to the snow; and, with a jingling of its deep-toned bell, started forward. The side horses twitched at the shafts, and kicked up the sugar-like gleaming crystals of the snow.

1 Called duga.

Nikolai followed Zakhar; behind them, with a creaking and crunching, came the others. At first they went rather gingerly along the narrow driveway. As they passed the park the shadows cast by the bare trees lay across the road and checkered the moonlight; but as soon as they got beyond the park enclosure, the snowy expanse—gleaming like diamonds, with a deep blue phosphorescence, all drenched in moonlight, and motionless—opened out before them in every direction.

All at once, the foremost sledge dipped into a cradle-hole; in exactly the same way the one behind it went down and came up again, and then the next behind; and then, boldly breaking the iron-bound silence, the sledges began to speed along the road one after the other.

"There is a hare track! Ever so many of them!" rang Natasha's voice through the frost-bound air.

"How light is it, Nicolas!" said Sonya's voice.

Nikolai glanced round, and bent over so as to get a closer look into her face. The pretty face, with an odd and entirely new expression, caused by the black brows and mustache, glanced up at him from under the sables.

"That used to be Sonya," said Nikolai to himself. He gave her a closer look, and smiled.

"What is the matter, Nicolas?"

"Nothing," said he, and he again gave his attention to his horses.

Having now reached the hard-trodden highroad, stretching away in the moonlight, and polished smooth by numberless runners, and all hacked up by the tracks of horseshoe nails, the horses of their own accord began to pull on the reins, and increase their speed. The off-horse, tossing his head, galloped along, twitching on his traces. The shaft-horse shook out into a trot, laying back his ears as if asking, 'Shall we begin, or is it too early as yet?'

Zakhar's troika, already a considerable distance ahead, the jingle of its deep-toned bell growing more and more distant, could be seen like a black patch against the whiteness of the snow. Shouts and laughter, and the voices of the party in the distance, could be plainly heard.

"Now then, my darlings!" cried Nikolaï, giving a firm rein with one hand, and raising his hand with the knout. And only by the increase of the wind that blew in their faces, and by the straining of the side horses, which kept springing and galloping faster and more furiously, could it be told at what a pace the troïka was flying. Nikolaï glanced back. With shouts and whistling, with cracking of whips and encouraging words to the horses, followed the other troïka at a flying pace. The back of the shaft-horse rose and fell steadily under the curved duga, but with no thought of breaking, and ready to give more and ever more speed, if it were required of him.

Nikolaï overtook the first troïka. They glided down a little slope, and came out upon a road wide enough for several teams to drive abreast, stretching along the intervale by the river side.

"Where will this take us, I wonder?" queried Nikolaï. "This must be the sloping intervale. But no, it is a place I don't recognize at all! I never saw it before! It is neither the sloping intervale nor the Dyomkin hill; God only knows where we are. It is certainly some new and enchanted place! Well, what difference does it make to us?"

And, shouting at his horses, he began to gain on the first troïka. Zakhar held his team to their work and turned round his face, white with frost even to the eyebrows.

Nikolaï gave his horses rein; Zakhar, reaching out his arms, clucked his tongue, and also gave his free rein.

"Now, steady there, barin!" cried he.
Still swifter flew the two troikas, side by side; and swiftly the legs of the horses interwove as onward they sped.

Nikolai began gradually to forge ahead. Zakhar, not changing the position of his outstretched arms, kept the hand that held the reins a little higher.

"You can’t come it, barin!" he cried to Nikolai. Nikolai urged all three of his horses to gallop, and sped past Zakhar. The horses kicked the fine dry snow into the faces of the party; the bells jingled together as they flew on, side by side; and the swiftly moving legs of the horses mingled together, while the shadows crossed and interlaced on the snow. The runners whizzed along the road, and the shouts and cries of the women were heard in each of the sledges.

Once more reining in his horses, Nikolai glanced around him. Everywhere was the same magical expanse, flooded deep with the moonbeams, and with millions of stars scattered over it.

"Zakhar is shouting, ‘Turn to the left;’ but why to the left?" queried Nikolai. "Are n’t we going to the Melyukofs’? Is this the way to Melyukovka’s? God knows where we are going, and God knows what is going to become of us, and it is very strange and very pleasant, whatever becomes of us."

He looked down into the sledge.

"Oh, see there! his mustache and eyelashes are all white," said one of the handsome young strangers, with delicate mustaches and eyebrows, who sat in the sledge.

"That, I think, must have been Natasha," said Nikolai to himself, "and that other is Madame Schoss; and, perhaps I am wrong, but that Circassian with the mustache I never saw before, but I love her all the same!"

"You are n’t cold, are you?" he asked. They gave no other answer than a merry laugh. Dimmler was shouting something from the hindmost sledge; it was probably funny, but he could not make out what it was.

"Yes, yes," replied other voices, with a burst of laughter.
"And now here is a sort of enchanted forest, with black shadows interlacing, and the gleams of diamonds, and something like an amphitheater of marble steps; and there are the silver roofs of an enchanted castle, and the piercing yells of wild beasts. ... But supposing after all it is Melyukovka's, then it would be still more wonderful that we should have gone, God knows how, and still have come out at Melyukovka's!" said Nikolai to himself.

In point of fact it was Melyukovka's, and maids and lackeys began to appear on the doorsteps of the entrance, with lights and happy faces.

"Who is it?" asked some one from the front door.

"Masqueraders from the count's, I can tell by the horses," replied various voices.

CHAPTER XI

PELAGAYA DANILOVNA MELYUKOVA, a very stout and energetic woman in spectacles, and wearing a loose-flowing capote, was sitting in the drawing-room, surrounded by her daughters, whom she was doing her best to entertain. They were quietly molding wax, and looking at the shadows cast by passers-by, when the steps and voices of the visitors began to echo through the anteroom.

Hussars, high-born ladies, witches, clowns, bears, coughing and wiping their frost-bound faces, came into the ball-room, where the candelabras were hastily lighted. The clown, that is, Dimmler, with the baruinya, that is, Nikolai, opened the dance. Surrounded by gleefully shouting children, the masqueraders, hiding their faces and disguising their voices, made low bows before the mistress of the mansion, and then scattered through the room.

"Akh! it's impossible to tell! Ah, that's Natasha! Just see whom she looks like! Truly she reminds me of some one! And there's Eduard Karlutitch! How elegant! I should n't have known you. Akh! how elegantly he dances! Akh! Saints preserve us! and who is that Circassian? Indeed, it reminds me of So- nyushka. And who is that? Well, well! this is a kind- ness! Move out the tables, Nikita, Vanya. And we have been sitting here so solemnly."

"Ha! ha! ha!" .... "What a hussar! What a hus- sar!" .... "Just like a boy, and what legs!" .... "I can't see!" .... such were the remarks on every side.

Natasha, who was a great favorite with the young Melyukofs, disappeared with them into some distant room, where a burnt cork and dressing-gowns and various articles of masculine attire were immediately in requisition; and these were snatched from the lackey who brought them, through the half-open door, by girlish arms, all bare. Within ten minutes all the young people of the Melyukof family came down, and rejoined the masqueraders.

Pelagaya Danilovna, who had seen that a sufficient place was cleared for her guests, and regalement prepared for the gentlefolk as well as the serfs, went round among the maskers with her spectacles on her nose, and a set smile, looking close into the faces of all, and not recognizing a single one. She neither recognized the Rostofs nor Dimmler, nor could she even distinguish her own daughters, or the masculine dressing-gowns and uniforms which they had put on.

"And who is that one?" she asked of the guver- nantka, and looking straight into the face of her daughter, who represented a Kasan Tatar: "I think it must be one of the Rostofs. Well, and you, Mister Hussar, what regiment do you serve in?" she asked of Natasha. "Give that Turk, yes, that Turk, some fruit- cake," said she to the butler, who was serving the refreshments; "it is not forbidden by their laws."

Sometimes, looking at the strange but absurd pas performed by the dancers, who gave themselves up completely to the idea that they were mumming, that no one would recognize them, and therefore felt no mock modesty, Pelagaya Danilovna would hide her face in her handkerchief, and her whole fat body would shake with the good-natured and uncontrollable laughter of old age.

After they had performed the plyaska, various khorovods and other Russian national dances, Pelagaya Danilovna had all the serfs and the others together form into a great circle; a ring, a rope, and a ruble were brought, and they began to play various games.

By the end of an hour the costumes began to show signs of wear and tear. The charcoal mustaches and eyebrows began to disappear from the sweaty, heated, jolly faces. Pelagaya Danilovna began to recognize the masqueraders, and congratulate them on the skill with which they had made up their costumes, and tell them how very becoming they were to the young ladies, and she thanked them all for having entertained her so well. The guests were invited into the drawing-room, and refreshments were provided in the ball-room for the serfs.

"No, but what a terrible thing to read your fortune in a bath!" exclaimed an old maid, who lived with the Melyukofs.

"Why so?" asked the oldest daughter of the family. They were now sitting down at supper.

"No, don't think of doing such a thing, it requires so much courage."

"I would just as lief," said Sonya.

"Tell us what happened to that young lady," asked the second Melyukova girl.

"Well, this is the way of it: a certain baruishnya," said the old maid, "took a cock, two plates, knives, and forks, as the way is, and went and sat down. She sat there and sat there, and suddenly she hears some one coming—a sledge drives up, with harness bells jingling; she listens, some one is coming! Some one comes in, absolutely in human form, just like an officer, and sits down with her where the second plate is set."

"Oh! oh!" screamed Natasha, rolling her eyes in horror.

"And how was it — how did he speak to her?"

"Yes, just like a man, everything was just as it should have been; and he began to talk with her, and all she needed to do was to keep him talking till the cock crowed, but she got frightened; as soon as she got frightened, and hid her face in her hands, then he clasped her in his arms. Luckily, just then, some maids came running in...."

"Now, what is the good of frightening them so!" protested Pelagaya Danilovna.

"Mamasha, you yourself have had your fortune told," exclaimed one of the daughters.

"How is it fortunes are told in a granary?" asked Sonya.

"Well, this is the way of it: you go into the granary and listen. It depends on what you hear: if there is any knocking or tapping, it's a bad sign; but if the wheat drops, then it's for good, and it will come out all right."

"Mamma, tell us what happened to you when you went to the granary."

Pelagaya Danilovna smiled.

"Oh, what's the use! and I have forgotten...." said she. "Besides, you would n't go, would you?"

"Yes, I would go, too; Pelagaya Danilovna, do let me; I certainly will go," said Sonya.

"Very well, then, if you are not afraid."

"Luiza Ivanovna, may I?" asked Sonya of Madame Schoss.

While they were playing the games with the ring, the ruble, and the rope, and now, while they were talking, Nikolai had not left Sonya's side, and looked at her from wholly new eyes. It seemed to him that this evening, thanks to that charcoal mustache, he, for the first time, knew her as she really was. In reality, Sonya, that evening, was merrier, livelier, and prettier than Nikolai had ever seen her before.

"Why! what a girl she is, and what an idiot I have been," he said to himself, as he gazed into her gleaming eyes, and saw her radiantly happy and enthusiastic smile dimpling her cheeks under her mustache, and that look which he had never seen before.
"I am not afraid of anything," said Sonya. "May I start now?"

She got up. She was told where the granary was, and how she must stand and listen, and make no noise. The servant brought her shuba. She flung it over her head, and gave a glance at Nikolai.

"How charming that girl is!" said he to himself. "And what have I been thinking about all this time?"

Sonya stepped out into the corridor on her way to the granary. Nikolai, making the excuse that he was too warm, hurried to the front steps. It was a fact, the crowd made the air in the rooms close. Out of doors it was as cold and still as ever; the same moon was shining, only it was brighter than before. The brightness was so intense, and there were so many stars in the snow that one had no desire to look at the sky; the real stars were insignificant. In the sky it was almost black and melancholy; on the earth it was gay.

"What an idiot I have been! what an idiot! Why have I waited so long?" mused Nikolai, and he sprang down the steps and turned the corner of the house by the foot-path that led back to the rear entrance. He knew that Sonya would come that way. Half-way along the path stood a great woodpile covered with snow, and casting a shadow; across it, and beyond it, fell the shadows of the lindens, bare and old, weaving patterns on the snow and the path.

The foot-path led to the granary. The timber walls of the granary and its roofs covered with snow shone in the moonlight like a palace made of precious stone. In the garden a tree cracked, and then everything became absolutely still again. It seemed to Nikolai that his lungs breathed in, not common air, but the elixir of eternal youth and joy.

Feet were heard stamping on the steps of the servants' entrance. Some one was scraping the snow away from the lower step on which it had drifted, and then the voice of an old maid said:—

"Straight ahead! straight ahead! right along this path, baruishnya. Only you must not look round."
"I am not afraid," replied Sonya's voice; and then toward Nikolai came Sonya's dainty feet, sliding and squeaking in her thin slippers.

Sonya came along, all muffled up in her shuba, and it was not till she was within two paces of him that she saw him: it seemed to her also that he was different from what she had ever known him before, and that he had nothing of what always made her a bit afraid of him. He was in his feminine costume, with clustering locks, and wearing a blissful smile such as Sonya had never seen before. Sonya swiftly hurried to him.

"She's entirely different; not at all the same," thought Nikolai, as he looked into her face, all kindled by the moonlight. He put his arms under her shuba, which encircled her head, strained her to his heart, and kissed her lips, which still showed traces of the mustache, and had a faint odor of burnt cork. Sonya returned his kiss full on the lips, and putting up her slender hands laid them on both sides of his face.

"Sonya!"

"Nicolas!"

That was all they said. They ran to the granary, and then they went back into the house by the doors through which they had come.

CHAPTER XII

When they drove home from Pelagaya Danilovna's, Natasha, who had seen and observed everything, made a redistribution of forces; so that Luiza Ivanovna and Dimmler went in the sledge with her, while Sonya and Nikolai and some of the maids drove together.

Nikolai, feeling now no anxiety to take the lead, drove deliberately along the homeward road; and as he kept turning to look at Sonya, with the weird moonlight falling on her, he tried to discover in that all-transforming light the Sonya of the past from the Sonya of the moment with her charcoal-penciled brows and mustache,—the Sonya from whom he was determined never to be parted.
As he looked at her, and remembered what she was, and what she had been; as he recalled that odor of the burnt cork—mingling so strangely in his consciousness of her kiss; and as he gazed at the ground swiftly gliding by, and at the glittering sky,—he felt that he was once more in the realm of enchantment.

“Sonya, art thou comfortable?” he would occasionally ask.

“Yes,” would be Sonya’s answer. “And art thou?”

When they were half-way home Nikolai told the coachman to hold the horses, and he ran back for a moment, to Natasha’s sledge, and leaned over the side.

“Natasha,” he whispered, in French. “Do you know, I have made up my mind in regard to Sonya.”

“Have you told her yet?” asked Natasha, becoming all radiant with delight.

“Oh, how strange that mustache and those eyebrows make you look, Natasha!—Are you glad?”

“Oh, I am so glad, so glad! I was beginning to grow angry with you. I have not told you so; but you have n’t been treating her fairly. She is such a true-hearted girl, Nicolas. How glad I am! I am often naughty, but I have reproached myself for being selfish in my happiness, and not sharing it with Sonya,” pursued Natasha. “But now I am so glad; but you must go back to her.”

“No, wait a moment. Fie! how absurd you do look!” exclaimed Nikolai, still gazing at her, and in his sister also discovering something new and unusual, and bewitchingly lovely, which he had never before noticed in her.

“Natasha! It’s like enchantment, isn’t it?”

“Yes,” replied she. “You have done nobly.”

“If ever I had seen her like this before,” thought Nikolai, “I should long ago have asked her advice, and what is more should have followed it, and all would have been well.... So you are glad, and I have done right, have I?”

“Oh, yes, perfectly right. It was only a little while ago that I got vexed with mamasha about this. Mamma said that she was trying to catch you. How could she say such a thing? I almost quarreled with mamma. And I will never allow any one to say anything mean about her, because she is goodness itself."

"All right, then, is it?" exclaimed Nicolaï, giving another searching look at the expression of his sister's face, so as to be sure that she was in earnest; and then, with creaking boots, he jumped down from the runner, and ran to overtake his own sledge. And there still sat the same radiantly happy little Circassian with mustache and gleaming eyes, under her sable hood; and this Circassian was Sonya, and this Sonya was assuredly to be his happy and loving wife in the days to come!

After they had reached home, and had told the countess how they had spent the time at the Melyukofs', the young girls went to their room. Without wiping off their burnt cork mustaches they undressed, and sat together for a long time, talking about their happiness. They had much to say about their future married lives, and what friends their husbands would be, and how happy they should be.

On Natasha's table stood dressing-glasses, placed there early that evening by her maid, Dunyasha.

"But when will all this be? Never, I fear .... it would be too great happiness to come true," said Natasha, as she got up and went over to the mirrors.

"Sit down, Natasha; maybe you will see him," said Sonya. Natasha lighted the candles and sat down.

"I see some one with a mustache," exclaimed Natasha, catching sight of her own face.

"You must not turn it into ridicule, baruishnya!" said Dunyasha.

Natasha, with the help of Sonya and her maid, got into the proper position before the glass; her face assumed a serious expression, and she remained silent. Long she sat there, looking at the row of waning candles in the mirror, wondering, as she remembered the heroines of stories she had heard, whether this mysterious "Twelfth Night" she should see her coffin, or whether she should see him, Prince Andreï, in the background of the dark and confused square of glass. But, as she was not ready to mistake the smallest spot or stain on the glass for the form of coffin or of a man, she saw nothing. Her eyes began to grow heavy, and she got up and left the mirror.

"How is it other people see things, and I never see anything?" she asked. "Now you sit down, Sonya. To-day, of course, you must look for yourself; but look for me, too...." said she. "I have such terrible pre-sentiments to-night!"

Sonya sat down in front of the mirrors, arranged herself in the right position, and began to look.

"Now, Sofya Aleksandrovna will surely see something," whispered Dunyasha. "But you are always making fun."

Sonya overheard this, and heard Natasha reply:—

"Yes, I know she will see something; she did last year, you remember."

For three minutes all sat in silence. "Of course she will...." whispered Natasha, but she did not finish her sentence. Suddenly Sonya pushed the mirror back, and covered her eyes with her hand.

"Akh! Natasha!" she cried.

"Did you see something? Did you? What did you see?" demanded Natasha, taking the mirror from her.

Sonya had seen nothing; her eyes were simply beginning to grow heavy, and she was just on the point of getting up when she heard Natasha beginning to say, "Of course she will." She had no intention of deceiving either Dunyasha or Natasha, but it was stupid sitting there! She herself did not know how or why it was that the cry had escaped from her when she covered her eyes with her hand.

"Did you see him?" demanded Natasha, seizing her by the arm.

"Yes. Wait .... I .... saw him," said Sonya, led by some unaccountable impulse, but not knowing which Natasha meant by him, Nikolai or Andrei. "But why should I not tell what I saw? Others have seen such things. And who can prove that I did or did n't see something," was the thought that flashed through Sonya's mind.
"Yes, I saw him," said she.

"How was it? was he sitting, or standing? How was it?"

"Now, I saw.... at first I could not see anything, then suddenly I got a glimpse of him, and he was lying down."

"Andrey lying down? Is he ill?" demanded Natasha, gazing at her friend with horror-stricken eyes.

"No, on the contrary, his face was cheerful, and he turned toward me...."

At that instant it began to seem to her that she had seen what she was telling.

"Well, and then what, Sonya?...."

"Then I did not see anything more! Something blue and red...."

"Sonya! When will he come back? When shall I see him? My God! How I tremble for him and for myself; and everything fills me with alarm...." cried Natasha; and, paying no heed to the words of comfort spoken by Sonya, she got into bed; and long after the candles were put out, she lay there motionless, with wide-open eyes, gazing at the frosty moonbeams flooding the icy window-panes.

CHAPTER XIII

Shortly after Twelfth Night, Nikolaï announced to his mother his love for Sonya, and his firm determination to make her his wife.

The countess, who had long before that remarked what was going on between the two young people, and who had been expecting this announcement, listened in silence to his words; and then coldly informed him that he might marry any one he pleased, but that neither she nor his father would countenance such a marriage.

For the first time, Nikolaï felt conscious that his mother was offended with him; that, notwithstanding all her love for him, she would not yield to him in this matter. Coldly, not even looking at her son, she sent for her husband; and when he came, she tried, in Nikolai's presence, to tell him, in a few chilling words, of what her son proposed to do; but she had not the necessary self-control: tears of vexation sprang to her eyes, and she was compelled to leave the room.

The old count tried feebly to reason with Nikolai, and begged him to give up his intention.

Nikolai replied that he could not go back on his word; and the father, sighing, and evidently all upset in his mind, hastily put an end to his discourse and went to the countess.

In all his encounters with his son, the count always had the consciousness of his own blameworthiness toward him, in regard to the squandering of his fortune; and, accordingly, he could not show his anger against his son for refusing to wed a rich wife, and for choosing the penniless Sonya; in all this affair, he remembered with the keener sorrow that, if only his estates had not been so ruined, it would be impossible for Nikolai to find a better wife; and that the only persons responsible for the wasting of this estate were himself and his Mitenka, and their incorrigible habits.

The father and mother had nothing more to say to Nikolai, in regard to this; but a few days later the countess summoned Sonya, and with a bitterness which no one in the world would have expected of her, reproached her niece with having decoyed her son, and accused her of ingratitude.

Sonya, in silence, and with downcast eyes, listened to the countess's bitter words, and was at a loss to know what was required of her. She was ready for any sacrifice for all of them, in return for their benefits. The thought of self-sacrifice was ever a delight to her; but, in this affair, she could not comprehend what she was required to sacrifice, or for whom. She could not help loving the countess, and all the Rostof family; nor could she help loving Nikolai, or knowing that his happiness depended on her love for him. She therefore stood silent and sad, and had nothing to reply.

It seemed to Nikolai that he could no longer endure this state of things; and he went to his mother to have a final explanation. Nikolai first besought his mother to be reconciled to him and Sonya, and consent to their marriage; then he threatened her that, if they persecuted Sonya, he would instantly marry her clandestinely.

The countess, with a coldness her son had never experienced before, replied that he was of age, that Prince Andreï was going to marry without his father's sanction, and that he might do the same; but that she would never receive this intrigantka as her daughter.

Angry at her use of the term intrigantka, Nikolai raised his voice, and told his mother that he had never thought that she would oblige him to sacrifice his noblest feelings; and that if this were so, then he would never....

But he did not finish uttering this rash vow, which his mother, judging by the expression of his face, awaited with horror, and which might have forever raised a cruel barrier between them. He did not utter it, because Natasha, with a pale and solemn face, came into the room; she had been listening at the door.

"Nikolinka, you don't know what you are saying; hush! hush! I tell you, hush!" she almost screamed, so as to drown his words. "Mamma, darling, there's no reason in this at all, dushetchka moya—dear heart," said she, turning still paler, and going to her mother, who felt that she was on the very edge of an abyss, and looked with horror at her son; and yet, by reason of her stubbornness, and the impulse of the quarrel, she would not, and could not, give in. "Nikolinka, I beg of you, go away; and you, sweetheart-mamma, listen," she entreated, turning again to her mother.

Her words were incoherent; but they brought about the wished-for result.

The countess, deeply flushed, buried her face in her daughter's bosom; and Nikolai got up and, clasping his head between his hands, rushed out of the room.

Natasha acted the part of peacemaker so well, that Nikolai received a promise from his mother that Sonya should not be annoyed; and he himself swore that he would never do anything without the knowledge of his parents.

1 Mama-galubushka.

With the firm intention of retiring from the service as soon as he could wind up his connection with his regiment, and return and marry Sonya, Nikolai, melancholy and grave, still under strained relations with his parents, but, as it seemed to him, passionately in love, rejoined his regiment early in January.

After Nikolai's departure, it became sadder than ever in the house of the Rostofs. The countess, owing to her mental tribulations, was taken seriously ill.

Sonya was depressed, both on account of her separation from Nikolai, and still more on account of the unfriendly manner in which the countess, in spite of herself, treated her. The count was more than ever occupied by the wretched state of his pecuniary affairs, which demanded of him the most heroic measures. It was absolutely necessary to dispose of their mansion in Moscow, and their pod-Moskovnaya estate: and in order to effectuate this sale, it was essential to go to Moscow. But the state of the countess's health caused him to postpone his departure from day to day.

Natasha, who had easily, and even cheerfully, borne the first weeks of separation from her lover, now every day grew more nervous and impatient. The thought that she was wasting the best time of her life, when she might so much better have been employing it in loving sacrifice for him, constantly tormented her.

His letters generally merely served to annoy her. It revolted her to think that when she was living only in the thought about him, he was living in the great world of action, seeing new places and new people, who were full of interest to him. The more fascinating his letters were, the more they annoyed her.

Her letters to him gave her no consolation; they were nothing but tedious and hypocritical exercises. She was not able to write freely, because she could not realize the possibility of correctly expressing in a letter even the thousandth part of what she was accustomed to express with her voice, her smile, and her glance. She wrote him perfunctory and monotonous letters, the stupidity of which she herself acknowledged; while her mother corrected in the rough draught the mistakes in spelling which she made.

The countess's health was still feeble; but it was now no longer possible to put off the return to Moscow. It was necessary to arrange for the marriage settlement, it was necessary to sell the mansion; and, moreover, Prince Andreĭ was now expected in Moscow, where his father, Prince Nikolaĭ Andreyitch, was spending the winter; indeed, Natasha was certain that he had already arrived.

The countess remained in the country; but the count, taking Sonya and Natasha with him, went to Moscow toward the end of January.
PART EIGHTH

CHAPTER I

PIERRE, after the engagement of Prince Andrei and Natasha, suddenly, without any apparent reason, began to find it impossible to pursue his former mode of life. Firmly as he was convinced of the truths revealed by the Benefactor; delightful as had been the first period of enthusiasm for the inward labor of self-improvement, to which he had given himself up with such zeal,—all the charm of this former existence suddenly vanished after the betrothal of his friends, and after the death of Iosiph Alekseyevitch, news of which he received at about the same time. Nothing but the empty skeleton of life remained to him: his mansion, with that brilliant wife of his, who was still enjoying the favors of an influential personage; his acquaintance with all Petersburg; and his duties at court with all their tedious formalities. And this life of his suddenly began to fill Pierre with unexpected loathing; he ceased to write in his diary; he shunned the society of the brethren; he began once more to frequent the club, and to drink heavily; he became intimate with the gay young bachelor set; and his behavior became such that the Countess Elena Vasilyevna found it necessary to give him a stern admonition.

Pierre felt that she was right; and, in order not to compromise her, he decided to go to Moscow.

In Moscow, as soon as he set foot in his enormous house, with the dried-up and withered princesses, and the swarm of menials; as soon as he went out into town and saw the Iverskaya Chapel, with its innumerable tapers burning before the golden shrines, and the Square of the Kreml, with its broad sheet of snow, the izvoshchiks, and the hovels of the Sivtsef Vrazhek; saw the old men of Moscow, who, with never a desire or a quickening of the blood, lived out their days; saw the old ladies, the Moscovite girls, the Moscovite dances, the Moscovite ball-rooms, and the Moscovite English Club,—he felt himself at home in a refuge of quiet. Life in Moscow gave him a sensation of comfort, and warmth, and coziness, such as one has in a dirty old dressing-gown.

Pierre was welcomed by all Moscow society, young and old, as a long-expected guest, whose place was always ready for him and never given to another. In the eyes of Moscow society, Pierre was most kindly, good-natured, intelligent, and benevolent, though eccentric, absent-minded, but cordial; a thoroughgoing Russian barin, of the old stamp. His purse was always empty, because it was opened to all. Benefits, wretched pictures, statuary, benevolent societies, gipsies, schools, subscription dinners, drinking-bouts, the Masons, churches, books,—no one and nothing ever met with a refusal from him; and if it had not been for two friends of his, who had borrowed large sums of him and now took him under their guardianship, he would have had absolutely nothing left. At the club, no dinner or reception was complete without him. As soon as he took his place on the divan, after a couple of bottles of Margeaux, the members would gather round him and vie with one another in all sorts of gossip, discussions, and clever stories. If discussions degenerated into quarrels, he would restore peace by his kindly smile alone, or by a clever jest. The Masonic meetings were tedious and dull if he were absent.

Often after dining with his bachelor friends, he would yield with a genial and weakly smile to their entreaties, and go with them where they went, and help the hilarious young fellows wake the echoes with their wild enthusiastic shouts. At the balls he would never refuse to dance, if partners were scarce. Young matrons and young girls liked him because he was attentive, especially after dinner, to all alike, without making invidious distinctions. It was a common saying of him: "He is charming; he has no sex."

Pierre had become simply a retired court chamberlain, good-naturedly vegetating in Moscow, like so many hundreds of others.

How horror-struck he would have been if, seven years before, when he was just back from abroad, some one had told him that it was idle for him to seek out or find a career; that the ruts in which he would move were long ago made for him, determined before the foundation of the world; and that, in spite of all his struggles, he should be what every one in his position was doomed to be. He would not have been able to believe this.

Had he not, with all his heart, wished at one time that a republic should be established in Russia? then, that he might be a Napoleon? then, a philosopher? then, a general, the conqueror of Napoleon? Had he not seen the possibility, and passionately desired to take part in the mighty task, of regenerating depraved humanity, and of bringing himself to the highest degree of improvement? Had he not established schools and infirmaries, and emancipated his peasantry?

But instead of what he had dreamed, lo! here he was, the rich husband of an unfaithful wife; a court chamberlain retired; a gourmand and wine-bibber, and easily inclined to criticize the government; a member of the Moscow English Club; and a flattered member of Moscow society! It was long before he could reconcile himself to the thought that he himself was a court chamberlain living in Moscow, the very type of what he should have so deeply despised seven years before.

Sometimes he comforted himself with the thought that this mode of life was only temporary; but then he would be terrified by another thought of how many people, just like himself, with all their hair, and their teeth still good, had entered temporarily into this mode of life, and into this club, and were now passing from it, bald and toothless.

In moments of pride, when he thought over his position, it seemed to him that he was of an entirely different nature, distinct from these retired chamberlains, whom he used to despise; that they were insipid and stupid, contented and satisfied with their position: "While I, on the contrary, am utterly dissatisfied; my sole desire is to do something for humanity," he would say to himself, in such moments of pride.

"But perhaps all these colleagues of mine are just like myself, and have been struggling and seeking to find some new and original path through life; and, like myself, have, by sheer force of circumstances, by the conditions of society and birth,—that elemental force against which man is powerless,—been brought into the same condition as myself." This he would say to himself in moments of humility; and, after he had lived in Moscow for some time, he ceased to despise his colleagues, the retired courtiers, and began to like them, and to esteem them, and to pity them, as he did himself.

Pierre no longer suffered, as formerly, from moments of despair, hypochondria, and disgust of life; but the same disease, which formerly had been made manifest by occasional attacks, had struck inward, and not for a moment ceased its insidious working.

"For what end? Why? For what purpose were we created in the world?" he would ask himself in perplexity many times every day in spite of himself, beginning to reason out some explanation of life; but as he knew by experience that such questions as these must remain unanswerable, he would strive in all haste to put them out of his mind,—taking up a book, or going over to the club, or calling on Apollon Nikolayevitch, to talk over the gossip of the town.

"Elena Vasilyevna, whom no one ever cared for except for her body's sake, and who is one of the stupidest women in the world," said Pierre to himself, "makes people believe that she is a woman of superior wit and refinement, and they bow down before her. Napoleon Bonaparte was despised by every one until he became great; but since he has become a miserable comedian, the Emperor Franz is trying to make him take his daughter illegally for his wife. The Spaniards, through the Roman Catholic clergy, offered up prayers of thanksgiving to God for granting them a victory over the French on the 26th of June; while the French, through the medium of the same Catholic priesthood, offer up thanksgivings to the same God for having beaten the Spaniards on the 26th of June! My brethren, the Masons, solemnly swear that they will be ready to sacrifice all they possess for their neighbor; but, when the box is passed around, they do not contribute a single ruble for the poor; and the Astraea lodge intrigues against the ‘Manna Seekers,’ and they toil and moil for the sake of getting a genuine Scotch carpet and a charter, the meaning of which is not known even by the one who copies it off, and which is necessary to no one. All of us profess the Christian law of forgiveness of injuries, and of love for our neighbor,—a law in obedience to which we have erected, here in Moscow, our forty forties of churches; while yesterday a deserter was flogged with the knout, and the priest, the servant of this same law of love and forgiveness, presented the crucifix for the soldier to kiss, before he received his punishment."

Thus mused Pierre; and this whole universal falsehood, acknowledged by every one, amazed him every time he thought of it; just as if he were not used to it, just as if it were some new thing.

"I understand this falsehood and confusion," he thought. "But how can I convince them of what I understand? I have made the experiment, and have always found that they, in the depths of their hearts, understand it just as I do; but they strive not to see it. Of course it must be so. But for me," Pierre asked himself, "what ought I to do?"

He was undergoing the unhappy experience of many people, especially Russians, who have not only the faculty of seeing and realizing the possibility of goodness and right, but of seeing too clearly the falsity and deception of life, to feel able to take any serious part in it.

Every department of activity was, in his eyes, com plicated with falsehood and deception. Whatever he had tried to be, whatever he had tried to accomplish, he always found himself jostled by this knavery and falsehood, with his path of activity completely blocked. But, meantime, it was necessary for him to live, necessary for him to find occupation. It was too terrible for him to be under the weight of these unsolvable problems of life; and so he gave himself up to the first temptation, in order to forget them. He frequented the society of all sorts and conditions of men, he drank deeply, he purchased paintings, he built houses, and, chief of all, he read.

He read, and read everything that came into his hands; and he was such an omnivorous reader that even when, on his return home, his valet came in to undress him, he continued his reading, and, after reading till he was tired, he would fall asleep; and the next morning he would go to the club, or call on acquaintances, and talk gossip, and from there go to some wanton rout where wine and women served to occupy his mind; and thus, around the circle again, from spree to reading, and then his idle gossip and his wine.

Strong drink was becoming for him constantly a greater and greater physical, and even moral, necessity. Although the doctors warned him that wine was dangerous to him, on account of his corpulency, he still continued to drink heavily. He felt perfectly happy only when, without knowing or caring how, he had poured down his capacious throat several glasses of wine, and begun to experience the pleasant warmth spreading through his frame, and good-will toward all the human race, and a mental readiness superficially to touch upon any question, without pretending to penetrate deeply into its inner nature. Only after he had drunk a bottle or two of wine, would he vaguely feel that this complicated, terrible coil of life, which had formerly appalled him, was now not so appalling as it had seemed. With a roaring in his ears, as he idly chatted, or listened to stories, or read his books after dinner or supper, he saw this tangle of doubts constantly facing him on every side. But it was only under the influence of wine that he could say to himself: "This is nothing; I will put it away for the present, for I have an explanation all ready. But now is no time; I will think it all out by and by."

This "by and by" never came.

When his stomach was empty, the next morning, all the former questions arose, just as unsolvable and terrible; and Pierre hastened to seize his book, and was delighted when any one came to call on him.

Sometimes Pierre remembered what he had heard of soldiers at war: that when they are lying idle under fire, they eagerly strive to invent some diversion, so as the more easily to forget the threatening danger. And it seemed to Pierre that all men were similar soldiers, distracting themselves from life: some by ambition, some by cards, some by codifying laws, some by women, some by gambling, some by horses, some by politics, some by hunting, some by wine, some by statecraft.

"There is nothing insignificant, there is nothing of great importance; all is the same in the end; only how can I save myself from it?" thought Pierre. "Only by not seeing it, this terrible it."

CHAPTER II

Early in the winter, Prince Nikolai Andreyitch Bolkonsky and his daughter took up their residence in Moscow.

The fame of his past life, the keenness of his intellect, and his bold originality immediately caused him to be regarded by the Moscovites with special admiration and respect; and, as the popular enthusiasm for the Emperor Alexander's management of affairs had notoriously cooled down, and as an anti-French and patriotic tendency was now the vogue in Moscow, he had become the center of the opposition to the government.
The prince had aged very considerably during the year past. He now began to manifest some of the acute symptoms of old age: unexpected naps, forgetfulness of recent events and vivid remembrance of those long past, and the childish vanity with which he accepted the rôle of chief of the Moscovite opposition. Nevertheless, when the old prince came down to evening tea, in his fur shubka and powdered wig, and at any one's instigation began to tell his pithy anecdotes about the days gone by, or deliver his still pithier and harsher judgments on the present, he inspired in all his guests a single feeling of sincere respect.

In the eyes of visitors, the old-fashioned house, with its huge pier-glasses, its ante-revolutionary furniture, its powdered lackeys, presided over by this severe and intelligent old man of a past generation, with his gentle daughter, and the pretty Frenchwoman, who treated him with such deference, presented an impressive but agreeable spectacle. But these visitors did not realize that, over and above the two or three hours when they saw the household, there were twenty-two more each day, during which the inner life of the house went on unseen.

This inner life had recently, especially during their stay in Moscow, become exceedingly trying for the Princess Mariya. In Moscow she was deprived of her dearest pleasures,—the visits from her pilgrims, and the solitude which gave her such consolation at Luisiya Gorui: she could find no comfort or joy in the crowded city. She did not go into society: everybody knew that her father would not allow her to go without him, and his health was too precarious to permit him to go out; and, consequently, she received no invitations to dinner-parties or balls. She had renounced all hope of ever being married. She had too often witnessed the coldness and irritability with which Prince Nikolai Andreyitch received and dismissed young men who occasionally came to their house, and who might have been her suitors.

The Princess Mariya had no friends: since her arrival in Moscow, her eyes had been opened in regard to the two who had been more intimate with her than all the rest. Mlle. Bourienne, in whom, even in times past, she could not feel perfect confidence, had now become positively disagreeable to her; and for several reasons she felt obliged to hold her at a distance.

Julie, with whom she had kept up an uninterrupted correspondence for five years, was in Moscow, but she seemed like an utter stranger to her when they met again face to face. Julie, by the death of her brothers, had become one of the wealthiest girls in Moscow, and was completely absorbed in the pleasures of fashionable society. She was surrounded by young men, who, she said to herself, had suddenly awakened to the appreciation of her merits. She found herself now rapidly growing old, and felt that her last chance of finding a husband was passing, and that now or never her fate must be decided.

The Princess Mariya, with a melancholy smile, remembered, as each Thursday came round, that now she had no one to write to, since Julie, whose presence gave her no delight, was in town and she could see her every week. She, like the old French émigré who refused to marry the lady at whose house he had spent all his evenings for a number of years, was sorry that Julie was so near because now she should have no one to write to. She had no one in Moscow to whom she could confide her sorrows, and since coming there these sorrows had increased and multiplied.

The time for Prince Andrei's return and for his marriage was drawing nigh, but his father seemed no more inclined than before to listen to his entreaties and sanction it; on the contrary, he would hear nothing to it; and the mere mention of the young Countess Rostova drove the old prince beside himself, and thus he was in a bad temper the greater part of the time.

The Princess Mariya had a new and additional trial, at this time, in the lessons which she gave her six-year-old nephew. In her treatment of Nikolushka she recognized with dismay that she was liable to fits of irritability similar to her father’s. No matter how many times she reproached herself for losing her temper during his lesson hours, it happened almost every time when she sat down with the pointer to teach him his French primer that from her very desire to help him along as rapidly as possible, to make his tasks easy and to give the little fellow all the superfluity of her own knowledge, the slightest inattention on the part of the little boy—who was afraid, to begin with, of an outbreak of his aunt’s irascibility—would make her tremble with indignation, lose her patience, grow angry and raise her voice, and sometimes even seize him by the arm and stand him in the corner. After she had stood him in the corner, she would begin to shed tears over her hasty temper, her ugly nature; and Nikolushka, sobbing out of sympathy, would leave his corner without permission, run up to her, and pull her tear-wet hands from her face, and try to comfort her.

But by far the greatest trial of all was caused the princess by her father’s irritability, which was always vented upon his daughter, and which of late became even cruelty. If he had compelled her to do penance all night long with prayers and genuflections, if he had struck her, if he had compelled her to draw wood and water, it would never have occurred to her that her position was hard; but this loving tyrant, all the more terrible from the very fact that he loved her, and therefore tormented both himself and her, took especial pains not only to insult and humiliate her, but to make her feel that she was always and forever in the wrong.

And latterly he had discovered a new whim, which tormented the Princess Mariya more than all else put together. This was his constantly increasing intimacy with Mlle. Bourienne. First suggested to his mind by the news of Prince Andrei’s engagement, the farcical notion that, if his son were going to marry, then he would marry Bourienne, evidently flattered his fancy, and of late he had stubbornly lavished especial attentions on the Frenchwoman,—for the special purpose, as it seemed to the Princess Mariya, of affronting herself, and of expressing his disapprobation of his daughter by making love to Bourienne.

In Moscow, on one occasion when the Princess Mariya was present,—it seemed to her that her father chose that time on purpose,—the old prince kissed Mlle. Bourienne's hand, and, drawing her to him, embraced and fondled her. The Princess Mariya flushed with anger and left the room.

After a few minutes, Mlle. Bourienne rejoined her, smiling, and began to tell some entertaining story in her agreeable voice. The Princess Mariya hastily wiped away her tears, went with decided steps straight to Bourienne, and, evidently not knowing what she was doing, began to shout at the Frenchwoman in furious haste, and with explosive accents: "It is shameful, contemptible, beastly, to take advantage of a man's weakness...." She did not conclude her sentence. "Leave my room," she fairly screamed, and then burst into tears again.

The following day, the prince said not a word to his daughter; but she observed that at dinner he ordered Mlle. Bourienne to be served in precedence of all others. At the end of the dinner, when the butler, according to his usual custom, handed the coffee round, serving the princess first, the old prince suddenly flew into a passion, flung his cane at Filipp, and instantly gave orders that he should be sent off to the army.

"You did n't obey me!.... Twice I told you!.... You did n't obey me!.... She's the first person in this house; she is my best friend," screamed the prince. "And if you," he added, in a perfect fury, for the first time addressing his daughter, "if you permit yourself, if you dare, another time, as you did this evening, to forget your duty before her, then I will show you who is master in this house. Away with you! Out of my sight! Here! beg her pardon!"

The Princess Mariya begged Amélie Bourienne's pardon, and then interceded with her father for the butler Filipp.

At such moments there arose in the Princess Mariya's soul a feeling like the pride of an immolated victim. And then, again, at such moments, this father whom she blamed would either search for his spectacles, not seeing them when they were close at hand, or would forget what had only just happened, or would stagger along on weakening limbs, glancing around lest any one should have seen his feebleness,—or, what was worse than all, after dinner, when there were no guests to keep him awake, would suddenly fall into a doze, dropping his napkin, and nodding his head over his plate. “He is old and feeble, and do I dare to judge him?” she would think at such moments, with revulsion of feeling and disgust at herself.

CHAPTER III

In 1811 there was living in Moscow a French doctor, Métivier, a handsome man of gigantic frame, amiable after the manner of his nation, and, as was said by every one, a physician of extraordinary skill. He had rapidly become fashionable, and was received in the houses of the highest aristocracy not merely as a doctor, but as an equal.

Prince Nikolaï Andreyitch, who had always scoffed at medical science, had lately, by Mlle. Bourienne’s advice, consulted this doctor, and soon became accustomed to him. Métivier used to visit him twice a week.

On the 6th of December (O.S.),—St. Nicholas’s Day,—all Moscow called at the prince’s door, but he gave orders to admit no one. He commanded, however, that a select few, whose names he handed the Princess Mariya, should be bidden to dinner.

Métivier came that morning with his congratulations, and in his capacity of physician took it upon him to violate the orders, de forcer la consigne, as he expressed it to the Princess Mariya, and he went in to see the prince.

It chanced that this morning the old prince was in one of his most detestable moods. The whole morning he wandered up and down the house, finding fault with every one, and pretending not to understand anything that was said to him, and that they would not understand him.

The Princess Mariya knew only too well that this mood of latent and persistent querulousness was certain to flash out into a tempest of fury, and all that morning of the prince's name-day she expected the outbreak, which was as sure to go off as a loaded musket at full cock.

Until the doctor's arrival, the morning passed in comparative serenity. Having admitted the doctor, the Princess Mariya took her book, and sat down in the drawing-room, near a door, where she could hear all that was going on in the prince's cabinet.

At first she heard only Métivier's voice, then her father's, then both voices speaking at once; then the door opened, and the dark-haired Métivier appeared on the threshold, his handsome face expressing alarm, followed by the prince in his nightcap and khalat, his face distorted with passion, and the pupils of his eyes dilated.

"Have you no wits?" screamed the prince. "Well, I have. You French spy! You slave of Bonaparte! Out of my house! Get out, I tell you!" and he slammed the door.

Métivier, shrugging his shoulders, went to Mlle. Bou-rienne, who, on hearing the loud voices, had rushed in from the adjoining room.

"The prince is not very well.... bilious, and a cerebral congestion. I will come in again to-morrow. Don't be worried," said Métivier; and, laying his fingers on his lips, he hastened out.

The prince was heard walking up and down in his room, in his slippers, and shouting, "Spies!.... Traitors, traitors everywhere! Not a minute's peace even in my own house!"

After Métivier's departure, the old prince summoned his daughter to him, and the whole brunt of his fury fell on her. She was to blame for admitting spies into his presence. Why, he had told her, said he, that she was to write down a list, and not to admit any one who was not on the list. Why, then, had she admitted this scoundrel? It was all her fault. He could not have a moment's rest with her, not even die in peace, said he. “No, matushka, you might as well make up your mind to it: we must part, we must part. I can't stand this sort of thing any more,” he exclaimed, and left the room.

And then, as if he feared that she might not understand how thoroughly his mind was made up, he came back to her, and, endeavoring to assume an expression of calmness, he added, “And don't you for a moment imagine that I say this to you in passion; no, I am perfectly calm, and I have made up my mind after full deliberation, and it shall be. We must part. Find a home somewhere else.”....

But he could not restrain himself, and, with a flash of indignation possible only to one who loves, he, though evidently suffering himself, shook his fist in her face and screamed, “And why on earth hasn't some idiot taken her for his wife?” He slammed the door after him, had Mile. Bourienne called to him, and quiet reigned in his cabinet.

At two o'clock the six persons invited to dinner arrived. These guests—the distinguished Count Rostopchin,¹ Prince Lopukhin and his nephew, General Chatrof, an old companion in arms of the prince's, and, for young men, Pierre and Boris Drubetskoï—were waiting for him in the drawing-room.

Having recently come to Moscow on leave of absence, Boris had been anxious to make the acquaintance of Prince Nikolai Andreyitch, and he had so far succeeded in winning his good graces that the prince made an exception in his case, and received him in spite of his being an eligible young bachelor.

The prince's house was not what one calls "fashion-

¹ Count Feodor Vasilyevitch Rostopchin (1763–1826), the famous governor-general of Moscow. Wrote satires under the pseudonym of Sila Andreyevitch Bogatuiref. His bulletins (afishi) were masterpieces of eloquence. While living in Paris he published his denial of having set fire to Moscow (La vérité sur l'incendie de Moscou: 1823).
able," but it was the center of a small circle, which, though it made little noise in the city, gave a more flattering distinction than any other to those who were admitted to it. This was made evident to Boris a week before, when he overheard Rostopchin tell the governor-general of the city, who invited him to dinner on St. Nicholas's Day, that it was impossible:

"On that day I always go and worship the relics of Prince Nikolai Andreyitch."

"Oh, yes, yes," replied the governor-general. "How is he?"

The little company gathered before dinner in the old-fashioned, high-studded drawing-room, with its ancient furniture, was like the gathering of a solemn court of justice. No one had much to say, and if they spoke it was in low tones.

Prince Nikolai Andreyitch came in, silent and preoccupied. The Princess Mariya seemed even more quiet and timid than usual. The guests took no pains to talk with her, for they saw that she was not attending to what they said. Count Rostopchin was the only one who kept up the thread of conversation, speaking now of the latest news in the city, and now of politics in general. Lopukhin and the old general rarely took any share in it. Prince Nikolai Andreyitch listened as a superior judge listens to a report presented to him, only showing by his significant silence, or by some curt monosyllable now and then, that he followed the drift of what was said.

The tone of the conversation made it evident that no one took any satisfaction in what was going on in the political world. They spoke of recent events which apparently confirmed the notion that everything was going from bad to worse; but in all their anecdotes and criticisms it was noticeable how each speaker came to a stop, or was brought to a stop, every time at that borderland where there was any possibility of personal reflections on his majesty the emperor.

The conversation at dinner turned on the most recent political news: the seizure by Napoleon of the possessions of the Duke of Oldenburg, and the Russian note—hostile to Napoleon—which had been despatched to all the courts throughout Europe.

"Bonaparte treats Europe as a pirate treats the ships he has captured," said Count Rostopchin, repeating an epigram that he had already got off a number of times before. "You can only marvel at the forbearance or the blindness of the sovereigns. Now it is the pope's turn; and Bonaparte is calmly proceeding to humiliate the head of the Catholic religion; and not a voice is raised in protest! Our sovereign is the only one who protests against the occupation of the duchy of Oldenburg. But then...."

Count Rostopchin came to a pause, conscious of having reached that point where criticism was impossible.

"He was offered other possessions, instead of Oldenburg," said Prince Nikolai Andreyitch. "Just as I transfer peasants from Luisiya Gorui to Bogucharovo, or to my Riazan estates, he does with dukes."

"The Duke of Oldenburg shows great force of character, and bears his misfortune with admirable resignation," said Boris, modestly joining the conversation. He made this remark because on his way from Petersburg he had been honored with an introduction to the duke. Prince Nikolai Andreyitch gave the young man a look, as if he had it in mind to make some reply to this, but checked himself, feeling that Boris was too young for him to waste his sarcasm upon.

"I have read our protest in regard to the Oldenburg affair, and was amazed at the bad style in which it was written," said Count Rostopchin, in the easy-going tone of a man who criticizes something which he knows perfectly well.

Pierre looked at Rostopchin in naïve amazement, unable to comprehend why he should be disturbed at the wretched style of the "note."

"What difference does it make how the note was written, count, provided the subject-matter is vigorous?" said he.
"My dear fellow, I think, with our army of five hundred thousand men, it might just as well have been couched in a good style!" said Count Rostopchin.

Pierre understood now why Count Rostopchin was disturbed by the wretched writing of the note.

"It seems to me there's a plentiful crop of penny-a-liners nowadays," said the old prince. "Yonder in Petersburg, everybody is writing not only 'notes,' but new laws, all the time. My Andryusha has been scribbling a whole volume of laws for Russia there. To-day, everybody is scribbling."

And he laughed unnaturally.

The conversation languished for a moment; then the old general called attention to himself, by a preliminary cough.

"Have you heard of what took place recently at a review at Petersburg?—How the new French ambassador acted?"

"What was that? Yes, I heard something about it. He made a very awkward remark in his majesty's presence, I believe."

"His majesty called attention to the division of grenadiers, and their splendid marching," pursued the general; "but it seems the ambassador showed absolute indifference, and permitted himself to say that at home in France they did not waste their time on such trivialities. The sovereign did not deign to give him any answer. But they say that at the subsequent review he did not say a word to him."

All were silent; it was out of the question to make any comment on this occurrence, since it concerned the monarch personally.

"Insolent wretches!" exclaimed the prince. "Do you know Métivier? I drove him out of the house to-day. He came, and was admitted, although I had given special orders to admit no one," said the prince, with an angry look at his daughter. And then he repeated his whole conversation with the French doctor, and gave the reasons that made him think Métivier a spy.
Though these reasons were very unsatisfactory and obscure, no one made any criticism.

After the roast, the champagne was handed around. The guests rose to their feet, offering the old prince their congratulations. The Princess Mariya also went round to him. He gave her a cold, angry look, and put up his wrinkled, clean-shaven cheek for her to kiss. The whole expression of his face told her that their conversation of the morning had not been forgotten, that his mind was just as fully made up, and that only the presence of his guests prevented him from saying the same thing over again.

When they went into the drawing-room for coffee, the older members of the company sat down together. Prince Nikolai Andreyitch grew more animated, and expressed his mind freely in regard to the war then just beginning. He declared that our wars with Bonaparte had hitherto been unsuccessful, and would be so long as we tried to make common cause with the Germans, and meddle with European affairs, as we were compelled to do by the peace of Tilsit. There was no sense in our battling either for or against Austria. Our policy lay in the east; and, as far as Bonaparte was concerned, we required only one thing: to protect our frontier, to have some firmness in our policy, and never to let him dare to cross the Russian frontier, as he did in 1807.

"And how is it possible for us to fight against the French, prince?" asked Count Rostopchin. "Can we take up arms against our teachers—our gods? Look at our young men! Look at our young ladies! Our gods are the French! our kingdom of heaven is Paris!"

He had raised his voice, evidently so that all might hear him.

"Our costumes are French, our ideas are French, our sentiments are French. You put out Métivier because he is a Frenchman, a good-for-nothing fellow; but our ladies grovel before him on their very knees. And last evening, at a party, out of five ladies, three were Roman Catholics; and these were working on canvas embroidery, on Sunday, by virtue of a dispensation from the pope! And there they sat, almost naked, for all the world like signboards for a public bath-house,—if I may be allowed the expression. Ekh! when I look at our young dandies, prince, I feel inclined to take the old cudgel of Peter the Great from the museum, and break their ribs for them in good old Russian style; that would put an end to all their whimsies!"

All were silent. The old prince, with a smile on his face, looked at Rostopchin, and nodded his head in assent.

"Well, prashchaïte,—good-by;—your illustriousness, take care of your health," said Rostopchin, rising with the abrupt motions characteristic of him, and offering his hand.

"Good-by, my dear.¹ You’re like a lute,—I always like to hear you," said the old prince, laying his hand on his arm, and offering his cheek for a kiss.

The others also got up with Rostopchin.

CHAPTER IV

The Princess Mariya, as she sat in the drawing-room and listened to the conversation and criticisms of the old men, understood nothing of what she heard; she was thinking only whether these guests had remarked the ill-will that her father showed toward her. She had not even noticed the peculiar attentions and civilities showed her all through the dinner-hour by Drubetskoï, who was now making his third visit to the house.

The princess, with a strangely abstracted and questioning glance, turned to Pierre, who, hat in hand and with a smiling face, was the last of the guests to come and pay her his parting respects after the old prince had retired. Thus it happened the two were left together in the drawing-room.

"May I stay a little longer?" he asked, tumbling his corpulent frame on an easy-chair near the Princess Mariya.

¹ Prashchaï, galubchik.
"Oh, yes, certainly!" replied she. Her glance seemed to ask, "Have you remarked anything unusual?"

Pierre was now in a happy after-dinner frame of mind. He gazed musingly straight forward, and smiled gently.

"Have you known that young man long, princess?" he asked.

"What young man?"

"Dribetskoi."

"No, not very long."

"Well, do you like him?"

"Yes, he is a pleasant young fellow. Why do you ask?" said the princess, her mind still on her morning's conversation with her father.

"Because I have made a discovery: the young man has come on leave of absence from Petersburg, with the sole and special purpose of marrying a rich wife."

"You have made that discovery?" exclaimed the Princess Mariya.

"Yes," pursued Pierre, with a smile; "and this young man so manages it that where the rich girls are gathered together, there he also is to be found! He is now undecided which to attack: you, or Mlle. Julie Karagina. He's very attentive to her."

"He goes there, then?"

"Yes, very often. And do you know the new way of making love?" inquired Pierre, with a cheery smile, evidently lapsing into that jolly spirit of good-humored ridicule for which he so often had reproached himself in his diary.

"No," replied the princess.

"In these days, in order to please the young ladies of Moscow, one must be melancholy. And he is very melancholy when he is with Mlle. Karagina," said Pierre.

"Really?" exclaimed the princess, gazing into Pierre's good face, and persistently thinking about her trials. "It would be so much easier," she thought, "if I could only make up my mind to confide in some one all my thoughts and feelings. And I should like especially to tell Pierre everything. He is so good and noble. It would certainly be easier for me. He would give me his advice."

"Would you marry him?" asked Pierre.

"Oh, good gracious, count! there are times when I would marry any one," suddenly exclaimed the Princess Mariya, unexpectedly to herself, and with tears in her voice. "Akh! how hard it is to love a near kinsman, and feel that.... no matter, though," she went on to say with trembling voice.... "you cannot do anything for him but only annoy him, and when you know that you cannot help things otherwise.... then, there is one thing, only one thing, to do.... to go away; but where could I go?"....

"What is it? What is the matter with you, princess?"

But the princess, without being able longer to control herself, burst into tears.

"I don't know what is the matter with me to-day. Do not criticize me; forget what I have said to you!"

All Pierre's gayety was gone. He anxiously questioned the princess; begged her to tell him everything, —to confide her trials in him; but her only reply was to beseech him to forget what she had said; that she herself did not remember what she had said, and that she had no trials except the one which he knew about already, that Prince Andrei's marriage threatened to bring about a quarrel between her father and brother.

"Have you heard anything about the Rostofs?" she asked, for the purpose of changing the conversation. "I am told that they will be here soon. André, also, I am expecting any day. I should have liked for them to meet here."

"And how does he look upon the matter, now?" asked Pierre, meaning by the pronoun the old prince, her father. The Princess Mariya shook her head.

"But what is to be done? The year will be up now in a few months. And this can never be. I only wish I could spare my brother the first minutes. I wish the Rostofs would come very soon. I hope to make her acquaintance. You have known them for a long time, have you not?” asked the Princess Mariya. “Tell me, with your hand on your heart, exactly the honest truth: what kind of a girl is she, and how do you like her? I want the whole truth, because Andrei, you know, takes such a tremendous risk in doing this against his father’s will, that I should like to know just how it is.”

A dull instinct told Pierre that in this repeated demand to hear the whole truth was betrayed the Princess Mariya’s ill-will toward her prospective sister-in-law, and that she had an idea that Pierre would not approve of Prince Andrei’s choice; but Pierre told her not so much what he thought as felt.

“I don’t know how to answer your question,” said he, reddening without any reason. “I really don’t know what kind of a girl she is. I can never analyze her. She is fascinating. But what makes her so, I can’t tell you; that is all that I can say in regard to her.”

The Princess Mariya sighed, and the expression of her face said, “Yes, this is what I expected and feared.”

“Is she intellectual?” asked the princess. Pierre deliberated.

“I think not,” said he, “but perhaps she is. She does not think it necessary to be intellectual .... but no, she is fascinating, nothing more.”

The Princess Mariya again shook her head disapprovingly.

“Akh! how I hope that I shall love her! You tell her so if you see her before I do.”

“I hear that they will be here in a few days,” said Pierre.

The Princess Mariya confided to Pierre her plan for making the acquaintance of her prospective sister-in-law as soon as she came to Moscow, and then trying to reconcile the old prince to her.
Boris had not succeeded in making a match with any of the rich Petersburg heiresses, and he had gone to Moscow with the same object in view. There he found himself undecided between two of the wealthiest girls in town, Julie and the Princess Mariya.

Although the Princess Mariya, in spite of her plain features, seemed to him more attractive than Julie Karagina, still there were difficulties in the way of paying his addresses to Bolkonsky's daughter. At his last meeting with her, on the old prince's name-day, she had replied to all his tentative remarks on the subject of the feelings so at haphazard that it was evident she had not heard what he said.

Julie, on the other hand, received his attentions only too gladly, though in a way peculiar to herself alone.

Julie was twenty-seven. After the death of her brothers she had become very rich. She was now far from being a beauty; but she had conceived the idea that not only was she still pretty, but far more captivating than she ever had been before. In this illusion she was sustained by the facts that, in the first place, she had become a very rich maiden, and, in the second place, as she grew older and older, men found her less dangerous, and were able to gather round her with more freedom, since they felt that they were not incurring any obligations in taking advantage of the suppers, receptions, and jollifications which took place at her house. Men who ten years before would have thought a second time about going every day to a house where there was a young girl of seventeen, lest they should compromise her and get entangled themselves, now unhesitatingly appeared there daily, and treated her, not as a marriageable damsel, but as an acquaintance irrespective of sex.

The Karagins' house, that winter, was the gayest and most hospitable in Moscow. Besides the formal receptions and state dinners, they every day entertained a numerous society, especially of men, who ate supper at midnight and broke up at three o'clock in the morning. Nor was Julie willing to miss a ball, an entertainment, or a new play at the theater. Her toilets were always in the height of the fashion. But, nevertheless, Julie pretended to be disenchanted with all life; she told everybody that she had no belief in friendship, or in love, or in any of the pleasures of this world, and hoped for peace only "yonder." She affected the tone of a maiden who has endured great disappointment,—of one, for instance, who had been disappointed in the man she loved, or cruelly deceived in him. Although nothing of the sort had ever happened to her, it began to be thought that such was the case, and she herself came to believe that her sufferings in life had been grievous. This melancholia did not stand in the way of her enjoying herself, or prevent the young men who came to her house from having a delightful time there. Every guest who went there paid his tribute to his hostess's melancholic mood, and then fell to talking about the things of this world, and dancing, and intellectual games, and the capping of verses,—or bouts rimés,—which were greatly in vogue at the Karagins'.

Some few of the young men, Boris among them, took a deeper interest in Julie's melancholy moods; and with these young men she had longer and more confidential conversations about the vanity of all things terrestrial, and she showed them her albums, filled with gloomy drawings, apothegms, and couplets.

Julie treated Boris with especial favor; she mourned with him over his lost illusions; she offered him those consolations of friendship which she was so well able to offer, having herself suffered so much in life; she also showed him her album. Boris made a sketch of two trees with the legend: Arbres rustiques, vos sombres rameaux secouent sur moi les ténèbres et la mélancolie—"O solitary trees, your dark boughs scatter down upon me gloom and melancholy." On another page, he drew the picture of a tomb, and wrote:—
"La mort est secourable et la mort est tranquille! Ah, contre les douleurs il n'y a pas d'autre asile.

'Tis death that gives us succor, death that gives us peace! Alas! 'tis then alone that earthly sorrows cease!

Julie declared that couplet to be charming! "There is something so ravishing in the smile of melancholy," said she to Boris, quoting, word for word, a passage from a book she was reading: "'Tis a ray of light falling in darkness, a shadow's difference between sorrow and despair, affording the hope of coming consolation."

Whereupon Boris wrote for her these lines:

Aliment de poison d'une âme trop sensible,
Toi, sans qui le bonheur me serait impossible,
Tendre mélancolie, ah, viens me consoler,
Viens calmer les tourments de ma tendre retraite,
Et mèlle une douceur secrète
À ces pleurs, que je sens couler.

Oh! poisoned aliment of souls too sensitive,
Thou that alone doth make it sweet for me to live,
Mild melancholy, come! Thy consolation bring!
The torments of my gloomy solitude, oh, calm!
Mingle thy secret soothing balm
With tears that never cease to spring.

Julie played on her harp, for Boris, her most melancholy nocturnes. Boris read aloud to her "Poor Liza," and more than once had to pause in his reading because of the emotion which overmastered him.

When they met in society, Julie and Boris exchanged glances to signify that they were the only people in the world capable of understanding and appreciating each other.

Anna Mikhailovna, who was a frequent visitor at the Karagins', and always managed to be a partner with Julie's mother, took especial pains to procure all possible information in regard to Julie's fortune—which consisted of two estates in the vicinity of Penza, and forest lands near Nizhni-Novgorod. Anna Mikhaïlovna, with humble dependence on the will of Providence, and with deep emotion, looked on the etherealized melancholy which served as a bond between her son and the wealthy Julie.

"Always charming and melancholy, cette chère Julie," she would say to the daughter.

"Boris says that here in your house he finds rest for his soul. He has suffered the loss of so many illusions, and he is so sensitive," she would say to the mother.

"Akh! my dear, I cannot tell you how devoted I am to Julie of late," she would say to her son. "And who could help loving her? She is such a celestial creature! Akh! Boris! Boris!" She was silent for a minute. "And how sorry I am for her maman!" she went on to say. "To-day she was showing me her accounts and letters from Penza, where they have colossal estates; and it is so trying for her to have no one to help her; they cheat her so!"

Boris's face wore an almost imperceptible smile, as he listened to his mother's words. He was quietly amused at her transparent shrewdness; but he listened to her, and sometimes asked her questions in regard to these Penzensk and Nizhegorodsky properties.

Julie had for some time been looking for a proposal from her melancholy-souled adorer, and she was ready to accept him. But some secret antipathy toward her, a distaste of her evident desire to get married, and of her affectations, and a feeling of horror at thus practically repudiating the bliss of true love, still kept Boris at a distance.

His leave of absence was now drawing to a close. He spent long hours, and every Sunday, at the Karagins'; and every day, when he came to think the matter over, he would decide that his proposal should take place on the morrow. But when he was in Julie's company, and saw her red face and chin, almost always dusted with powder, her moist eyes, and the expression of her face, which seemed ready, at a moment's notice, to fly from melancholy to the equally unnatural enthusiasm and rapture of wedded bliss, Boris could not bring himself to utter the decisive words: although, in his imagination, he had for some time regarded himself as the prospective master of the Karagin estates, and had many times overspent the income arising therefrom.

Julie noticed Boris's infirmity of purpose, and it sometimes occurred to her that he had an antipathy for her; but her feminine vanity quickly restored her confidence, and she would assure herself that it was merely his love that made him so bashful. Her melancholia, however, was beginning to change into vexation; and a short time before the time of Boris's departure, she was thinking of adopting some decisive plan.

Just before Boris's leave of absence drew to a close, Anatol Kuragin made his appearance in Moscow, and, as a matter of course, in the Karagins' drawing-room; and Julie, abruptly arising from her melancholy, became very cheerful, and manifested great friendliness toward Kuragin.

"Mon cher," said Anna Mikhailovna to her son, "I know on good authority that Prince Vasili has sent his son to Moscow to make a match with Julie. I am so fond of Julie that I should be very sorry for her. What do you think about it, my dear?" asked Anna Mikhailovna.

Boris was thoroughly humiliated at the thought of being left out in the cold, and of having wasted this whole month in arduous, melancholic service of Julie, and of seeing another man—especially such an idiot as Anatol—having control of that income from the Penzensk estates, which he was already, in his imagination, enjoying and profiting by. He went to the Karagins' with a full determination to offer himself. Julie met him with a gay and careless mien, gave him a merry account of what a good time she had enjoyed at the ball the evening before, and asked him when he was going back.
In spite of the fact that Boris had come with the intention of confessing his love, and had, therefore, decided to be tenderly sentimental, he immediately began, in a tone of irritation, to complain of woman's inconstancy, pointing out how easy it was for women to shift from gloom to glee, and that their moods depended wholly on the one who happened to be dancing attendance upon them. Julie took offense at this, and declared that he was right; that women needed variety, and nothing was more annoying to any one than to have a perpetual sameness.

"Then, I should advise you...." began Boris, with the intention of winging a sharp retort; but at that instant came the humiliating thought that he was on the point of leaving Moscow without attaining his wished-for end, and at the cost of wasted labor—a thing to which he was unaccustomed. He paused in the middle of his sentence, dropped his eyes to avoid seeing the look of disagreeable annoyance and indecision on her face, and said:—

"However, it was not at all for the purpose of quarreling with you that I came here. On the contrary...." He looked at her, to see whether she would encourage him to proceed. All expression of annoyance had suddenly vanished, and her restless, imploring eyes were fixed on him with greedy expectation. "I can always manage so as to keep out of her way," thought Boris. "Here I am in for it; might as well finish."

He flushed crimson, raised his eyes to hers, and said:—

"You know my sentiments toward you...."

There was no need of saying more: Julie's face had become radiant with triumph and satisfaction; but she compelled Boris to tell her all that it is customary to say in such circumstances, to tell her that he loved her, and that he had never loved any one else so passionately. She knew that, in exchange for her Penzensk estates and Nizhegorodsky forests, she had a right to exact this; and she obtained what she wished.

The young couple, with no further thoughts of solitary trees shedding gloom and melancholy, laid their plans for the future establishment of a magnificent home in Petersburg, made calls, and got everything ready for a brilliant wedding.

CHAPTER VI

Count Ilya Andreyevitch, together with Natasha and Sonya, arrived in Moscow toward the end of January. The countess was still ailing, and was unable to travel, but it was out of the question to wait for her recovery: Prince Andrei was expected in Moscow every day; and, besides, it was important to purchase Natasha's wedding outfit; it was necessary to sell the pod-Moskovnaya estate; and it was necessary to take advantage of the old prince's presence in Moscow, in order that he might become acquainted with his future daughter-in-law.

The Rostofs' Moscow house had not been warmed. Besides, they were to be in town for only a short time, and the countess was not with them; accordingly, Ilya Andreyitch decided to accept the hospitality of Marya Dmitrievna Akhrosimova, who had long ago urged them to come to her.

Late one evening, the four coaches on runners, conveying the Rostofs, drove into Marya Dmitrievna's courtyard, on the Old Konyushennaya Street.

Marya Dmitrievna lived alone. Her daughter was married. All of her sons were in the government service. She was just as erect as ever; her words were as much to the point; she always expressed her opinion to every one in a loud and decided voice, and her whole personality seemed to be a living reproach against all weaknesses, passions, and impulses, the necessity of which she utterly denied. From early morning, dressed in her jacket, she gave personal attention to the domestic arrangements, and then went out for a drive; if it were a holy day, to mass; and thence to the prisons and jails, where she had business that she never mentioned to any one.
On ordinary days, on finishing her toilet, she received applicants of every rank and condition who chanced to come to her door. Her charities having been dispensed, she dined; and this abundant and well-ordered meal was always shared by three or four guests; after dinner, she made up a table for Boston. Late in the evening, she had newspapers or some new book read aloud to her, while she sat with her knitting. She rarely accepted invitations, and if she ever made any exceptions it was only in favor of the most important personages of the city.

She had not yet retired when the Rostofs arrived; as the door into the hall creaked on its hinges, and admitted the travelers and their retinue of servants, together with a rush of cold air, Marya Dmitrievna, with her spectacles toward the end of her nose, came and stood in the doorway, her head erect, and gazed at the visitors with a stern and solemn face. One might have thought that she was really angry, and was about to turn the intruders out, if she had not been heard at that very instant to give the most urgent orders in regard to the disposition of her guests and their luggage.

"The count's?—bring them this way," said she, indicating certain trunks, and not stopping to greet any of the party. "The young ladies', this way to the left!—Well, and what are you gaping there for?" she cried to the maids. "Have the samovar got ready.—Plumper and prettier than ever!" she cried, taking possession of Natasha, whose face, under her hood, was all rosy with the cold. "Fo! how cold you are! There, get off your wraps as quick as ever you can," she cried to the count, who was bending over to kiss her hand. "You're frozen, most likely! have some rum put in with the tea! Sonyushka, bon jour!" said she to Sonya, showing by this French phrase and the pet diminutive her rather condescending, and yet affectionate, relationship to the girl.

When they had taken off their wraps, and put themselves to rights after their journey, they gathered round the tea-table, and Marya Dmitrievna kissed them all in turn.
"I am right glad that you have come, and that you have put up at my house," said she. "It's high time," she went on, giving Natasha a significant look. "The old man is here, and his son is expected from day to day. You must, you certainly must, make his acquaintance. Well, we'll talk about all this by and by," she added, giving Sonya a look, as much as to say that she did not care to talk about this in her presence. "Now, listen!" said she, addressing the count. "What are your plans for to-morrow? Whom will you send for? Shinshin?" She doubled over one finger. "Then, that sniveling Anna Mikhailovna.—Two. She and her son are here. Son's to be married. Then, Bezukhov, I suppose? And he and his wife are here. He ran away from her, but she came trapesing after him. He dined with me on Wednesday. Well, then, and these?" she indicated the young ladies. "I will take them to-morrow to the Iverskaya chapel, and then to Aubert-Chalme's. Of course, everything will have to be got new for them. Don't judge by me! Such sleeves they wear these days! Recently, the young Princess Irena Vasilyevna came to call on me: she was a marvel to see; she had sleeves like two barrels on her arms. You see, there's some new fashion every day. And what business have you on hand?" she asked, turning sternly on the count.

"Everything in the quickest possible time," replied the count. "To buy the girls' duds, and to find a purchaser for my pod-Moskovnaya land and house. And so, if you will allow me, I will tear myself away for a little while, and slip off to Marinskoye for a day, and leave my girls with you."

"Very good, very good; they'll be safe with me. They couldn't be safer with the Orphans' Aid Society. I'll take them wherever they need to go, and scold them, and spoil them with flattery," said Marya Dmitrievna, stroking with her big hand the cheek of her favorite god-daughter, Natasha.

The following morning they went to pray before the 1 Opekunsky Sovyet.

Iverskaya Virgin, and to see Mademoiselle Aubert Chalmé, who stood in such awe of Marya Dmitrievna that, in order to get rid of her as soon as possible, she would always sell her goods at a positive loss. Marya Dmitrievna ordered there the larger part of the trousseau. On their return, she drove everybody else out of the room, and called Natasha to her arm-chair.

"Now, then, let us have a talk. I congratulate you on your choice. You have secured a fine young man. I am glad for you. I have known him ever since he was so high." She put her hand about thirty inches from the floor. Natasha colored with pleasure.

'*I am fond of him and of all his family. Now, listen! You know very well that the old Prince Nikolai is very averse to having his son marry. A whimsical old man! However, Prince Andrei is not a child, and his permission is not necessary; still, it is not pleasant to enter a family against their will. We must act quietly and with tact. You are clever; we will manage to bring him round where he ought to be. You must accomplish it by your sweetness and cleverness. That's all it requires, and it will come out all right."

Natasha made no reply,—from shyness, Marya Dmitrievna supposed, but in reality because it was annoying to Natasha that any one should meddle with her love-affair with Prince Andrei; for it seemed to her so entirely above and beyond all ordinary human concerns, that no one else, in her opinion, could understand it. She loved and admired Prince Andrei alone; he loved her, and was coming in a few days, and would make her his. That was all-sufficient.

"You see, I have known him for a long time, and Mashenka, also, your future sister-in-law. I am fond of her, in spite of the proverb about husband's sisters. She would not hurt a fly. She asked me to introduce her to you. You and your father must go there to-morrow. Be sure to be very sweet to her, for you are younger than she is. Before your friend comes you will have already become acquainted with his sister and his father, and they will have grown fond of you. Am I not right? Is n't that best?"

1 Zalovki, kalatovki, pobě galovki: Husband's sisters are churn-sticks (wranglers) whereby heads are broken.

"Yes," replied Natasha, with little heartiness.

CHAPTER VII

On the following day, by Marya Dmitrievna's advice, Count Ilya Andreyitch and Natasha went to call at Prince Bolkonsky's. The count, in anything but a happy frame of mind, made ready for this call; in fact, he felt terribly about it. He remembered too well his last encounter with the old prince, at the time of the mobilizing of the militia, when, in answer to his invitation to a dinner-party, he had received an angry reprimand for not having furnished his full quota of men.

Natasha, however, having put on her best gown, was in the most radiant spirits. "They cannot help being fond of me," she said to herself. "Every one likes me, and I am so willing to do for them all they could wish! I am so willing to love him because he is his father, and to love her because she is his sister, that they cannot fail to love me."

They drove up to the gloomy old house on Vozdvizhenka Street, and went into the vestibule.

"Well, God have mercy on us!" exclaimed the count, half in jest, half in earnest; but Natasha observed that her father was very much agitated as he hastened into the anteroom and asked, in a timid, faltering voice, if the prince and the princess were at home. After their names had been sent in, the prince's servants seemed to be thrown into great perplexity. The footman, who had hurried off to announce them, was stopped by another footman at the drawing-room door, and the two began to whisper together. A chambermaid came hurrying into the hall, and she also had something to say to them, in reference to the princess. Finally a stern-faced, elderly footman approached the Rostofs and announced that the old prince was unable to receive them, but the princess would be glad to see them.

Mlle. Bourienne first came to receive the visitors. She met them with more than ordinary politeness, and conducted them to the princess. The princess, agitated and nervous, her face covered with crimson patches, hastened forward, stepping heavily, and vainly endeavoring to appear calm and dignified.

At first sight Natasha did not please her. It seemed to her that she was too fashionably dressed, too frivolous, flighty, and conceited. The Princess Mariya did not realize that even before seeing her future sister-in-law she was prejudiced against her through an involuntary envy of her beauty, youth, and happiness, and jealousy of her brother's love for her. Over and above these obscure feelings of antipathy, the Princess Mariya was still more agitated from the fact that when the Rostofs were announced the prince had shouted at the top of his voice that he would not have anything to do with them; that the Princess Mariya might receive them if she so desired, but that they should not come into his presence. The princess determined to receive them, but she was afraid lest at any minute the prince might perform some act of rudeness, since he seemed greatly stirred up by the Rostofs' arrival.

"I have brought my little songstress, my dear princess," said the count, with a bow and a scrape, and looking round anxiously, as if he were afraid of the old prince appearing on the scene. "I am very anxious for you to become acquainted. .... I am sorry, very sorry, that the prince is ill." And, after making a few commonplace remarks, he got up, saying, "If you will excuse me, princess, I will leave my Natasha with you for a brief quarter of an hour, while I slip out and call on Anna Semyonovna, who lives only a couple of steps from here. I will come back for her."

Ilya Andreyitch, as he afterwards told his daughter, conceived this master-stroke of subtile diplomacy for the purpose of giving the future sisters-in-law a chance to get better acquainted; but he had another reason besides, which was that he might escape the possibility of meeting the prince. This reason he did not confess to his daughter, but Natasha perceived this timidity and anxiety of her father's, and felt abused. She blushed for him, and was still more annoyed with herself for having blushed; and she looked straight at the princess with a defiant, challenging expression, which seemed to imply that there was nothing she was afraid of. The princess told the count that he was perfectly excusable, and only hoped that he would make his stay at Anna Semyonovna's as long as possible. Accordingly, Ilya Andreyitch took his departure.

Mlle. Bourienne, in spite of the anxious, beseeching glances given her by the Princess Mariya, who was anxious to have a confidential talk with Natasha, did not see fit to leave the room, and kept up a steady stream of chatter about the delights of Moscow, and the theaters. Natasha was piqued by the confusion that had occurred in the reception-room, by her father's cowardice, and by the unnatural tone affected by the princess, who, it seemed to her, felt that it was an act of condescension to receive her, and, consequently, everything gave her a disagreeable impression. The Princess Mariya displeased her. She thought she was very plain, stubborn, and unsympathetic. Natasha suddenly underwent a moral shrinking, as it were, and, in spite of herself, assumed such a reckless tone that the Princess Mariya was still further alienated from her.

After five minutes of a labored and artificial conversation, slippered feet were heard rapidly approaching. Into the Princess Mariya's face came a sudden look of dismay. The door opened, and the old prince came in, dressed in a white nightcap and khalat.

"Akh! sudaruinya," he exclaimed; "sudaruinya, countess—Countess Rostova, if I am not mistaken—I beg your pardon, I beg your pardon.—I did not know, sudaruinya, 'fore God I did not know that you were honoring us with your presence. I was coming to see my daughter, which explains this costume. I beg you to pardon it. — 'Fore God I did not know," he said for the second time, in such an unnatural tone, laying such a special stress on the word "God," and speaking so disagreeably, that the Princess Mariya got up, and dropped her eyes, not daring to look either at her father or at Natasha. Natasha got up and then sat down again, and likewise knew not what to do. Only Mlle. Bourienne wore a pleasant smile.

"I beg your pardon. I beg your pardon. 'Fore God I did not know," grumbled the old prince, and, after staring at Natasha from head to foot, he left the room. Mlle. Bourienne was the first to recover self-possession after this apparition, and she began to talk about the prince's failing health. Natasha and the princess looked at each other without speaking, and the longer they looked at each other without expressing what they ought to have said, the more they were confirmed in their mutual dislike.

When the count returned, Natasha made an ill-mannered display of relief, and immediately prepared to take her departure. At this moment she almost hated this dried-up old princess, who by her silence had put her in such an awkward position, and who, in half an hour's talk with her, had not once mentioned Prince Andrei. "Of course I can't be the first to speak of him in the presence of that Frenchwoman," said Natasha to herself.

The Princess Mariya, at the same time, was tormented by a similar compunction. She knew that it was her duty to say something to Natasha; but she found it impossible, both because Mlle. Bourienne's presence embarrassed her, and because she herself did not know what made it so difficult to speak on the coming marriage. After the count had already left the room the Princess Mariya went to Natasha with hurried steps, seized her hand, and with a deep sigh said, "Wait a moment, I must...." Natasha gave the Princess Mariya a satirical glance, though she could not have told what made her do so, and listened. "My dear Natalie," said the Princess Mariya, "you must know I am delighted my brother has found happiness.” ....

She paused with a consciousness that she was not telling the truth. Natasha noticed this pause, and suspected the cause of it.

“I think, princess, that it is not a propitious time to speak of this,” said Natasha, with an appearance of outward dignity and hauteur, while the tears almost choked her.

“What have I said? what have I said?” she wondered, as soon as she left the room.

That day they waited for Natasha a long time at dinner. She was sitting in her room, sobbing like a child, blowing her nose, and then beginning to sob again. Sonya stood beside her, and kissed her on the hair.

“Natasha, what is there to cry about?” she asked. “Why should you care about them? It will all pass over, Natasha.”

“No; if you only knew how humiliating it was!—I just ....”

“Don’t speak of it, Natasha. Of course you were not to blame, then why should you let it trouble you? Kiss me,” said Sonya.

Natasha lifted her head and kissed her friend on the lips, laying her tear-wet face next hers.

“I cannot tell you. I do not know. No one is to blame,” said Natasha. “If any one is, I am. But all this is terribly painful. Akh! why does he not come?” ....

She went down to dinner with reddened eyes. Marya Dmitrievna, who had learned how the Rostofs had been received at the prince’s, pretended to pay no attention to Natasha’s disconsolate face, and jested in loud and eager tones with the count and her other guests.

vol. iii.—15
CHAPTER VIII

That evening the Rostofs went to the opera, Marya Dmitrievna having secured them tickets. Natasha felt no desire to go, but it was impossible for her to refuse her hostess's kindness, which had been designed expressly for her pleasure. When, after she was already dressed, and had gone into the parlor to wait for her father, she surveyed herself in the great pier-glass, and saw how pretty, how very pretty, she was, she felt even more melancholy than before, but her melancholy was mingled with a feeling of sweet and passionate love.

"Bozhe moï! if he were only here I should not be so stupidly shy before him as I was before. I would throw my arms around him and cling close to him, and make him look at me with those deep, penetrating eyes of his, with which he has so often looked at me; and then I would make him laugh, as he laughed then, and his eyes... how plainly I can see his eyes even now," said Natasha to herself. "And what do I care for his father and his sister? I love him. I love him, him alone, with his dear face and eyes, with his smile, like that of a man and like that of a child too. . . . No, it is better not to think about it, to forget him, and to forget that time, too, absolutely. I cannot endure this suspense. I shall be crying again," .... and she turned away from the mirror, exercising all her self-control not to burst into tears. "And how can Sonya be so calm and unconcerned in her love for Nikolenka, and wait so long and patiently?" she wondered, as she saw her cousin coming toward her, also in full dress, and with her fan in her hand. "No, she is entirely different from me. I cannot."

Natasha at that moment felt herself so full of passion and tenderness that it was not enough to love, and to know that she was loved. What she wanted now, at this instant, was to throw her arms around her lover's neck, and speak to him, and hear him speak those words of love of which her heart was full.
As she rode along in the carriage, sitting next to her father, and dreamily looking at the lamplights that flashed through the frost-covered windows, she felt still deeper in love, and still more melancholy than ever, and she quite forgot with whom and where she was going.

Their carriage fell into the long line, and the wheels slowly creaked over the snow as they drew up to the steps of the theater. The two girls gathered up their skirts and quickly jumped out; the count clambered down, supported by the footmen, and, making their way through the throng of ladies and gentlemen and program venders, the three went into the corridor that led to their box. Already the sounds of music were heard through the closed doors.

"Natalie, your hair," whispered Sonya in French. The kapellendiener, hastening past the ladies, politely opened their box door. The music sounded louder; the brightly lighted rows of boxes occupied by ladies with bared shoulders and arms, and the parterre filled with brilliant uniforms, dazzled their eyes. A lady who entered the adjoining box shot a glance of feminine envy at Natasha. The curtain was still down, and the orchestra was playing the overture.

Natasha, shaking out her train, went forward with Sonya and took her seat, glancing at the brightly lighted boxes on the opposite side of the house. The sensation, which she had not experienced for a long time, of having hundreds of eyes staring at her bare arms and neck, suddenly affected her both pleasantly and unpleasantly, and called up a whole swarm of recollections, desires, and emotions associated with that sensation.

Natasha and Sonya, both remarkably pretty girls, and Count Ilya Andreyitch, who had not been seen for a long time in Moscow, naturally attracted general attention. Moreover, every one had a general notion that Natasha was engaged to marry Prince Andreï, and everybody knew that ever since the engagement the Rostofs had been residing at their country estate; therefore they looked with much curiosity at the "bride" of one of the most desirable men in Russia.

Natasha's beauty, as everybody told her, had improved during their stay in the country, and that evening, owing to her excited state of mind, she was extraordinarily beautiful. No one could have failed to be struck by her exuberance of life and beauty, and her complete indifference to everything going on around her. Her dark eyes wandered over the throng, not seeking for any one in particular, and her slender arm, bare above the elbow, leaned on the velvet rim of the box, while, with evident unconsciousness of what she was doing, she crumpled her program, folding and unfolding it in time with the orchestra.

"Look, there's Alenina," said Sonya, "with her mother, I think."

"Saints! Mikhail Kiriluitch has grown fat, though," exclaimed the old count.

"See, there's our Anna Mikhaïlovna. What kind of a head-dress has she on?"

"There are the Karagins, and Boris with them. Evidently enough, an engaged couple.... Drubetskoï must have proposed."

"What! didn't you know it? 'T was announced to-day," said Shinshin, coming into their box.

Natasha looked in the same direction as her father was looking, and saw Julie, who, with a string of pearls around her fat red neck,—covered with powder, as Natasha knew well,—was sitting next her mother with a radiantly happy face. Behind them could be seen Boris's handsome head, with sleekly brushed hair. He was leaning over so that his ear was close to Julie's mouth, and as he looked askance at the Rostofs he was saying something to his "bride."

"They are talking about us,—about me," thought Natasha, "and she's probably jealous of me, and he is trying to calm her. They need not worry about it. If they only knew how little I cared about them!"

Behind them sat Anna Mikhaïlovna, festive and bliss-

---

1 Batyushki,—literally, "little fathers."
ful, and wearing her habitual expression of utter resignation to God's will. Their box was redolent of that atmosphere characteristic of a newly engaged couple, which Natasha knew and loved so well. She turned away, and suddenly all the humiliating circumstances of her morning visit recurred to her memory.

"What right has he not to be willing to receive me as a relation? Akh! I'd best not think about this, at least not till he comes back," said she to herself, and she began to scan the faces of strangers or acquaintances in the parterre.

In the front row, in the very middle of the house, leaning his back against the railing, stood Dolokhof in Persian costume, with his curly hair combed back into a strange and enormous ridge. He was standing in full view of the whole theater, knowing that he was attracting the attention of every one in the house, yet looking as unconcerned as if he was in the privacy of his own room. Around him were gathered a throng of the gilded youth of Moscow, and it was evident that he was their leader.

Count Ilya Andreyitch, with a smile, nudged the blushing Sonya, and called her attention to her former suitor.

"Did you recognize him? and where did he turn up from?" asked the count of Shinshin. "He had disappeared entirely, had he not?"

"Yes, completely," replied Shinshin. "While he was in the Caucasus he deserted, and they say he became minister to some reigning prince in Persia. After that he killed the Shah's brother, and now all the young ladies of Moscow have lost their wits over him. Dolokhof le Persan, and that's the end of it. Here with us there's nothing to be done without Dolokhof. They swear by him. He is made a subject of invitation, as if he were a sterlet," said Shinshin. "Dolokhof and Anatol Kuragin have turned the heads of all our young ladies."

Just then into the next box came a tall, handsome lady with a tremendous plait of hair, and a great display of plump white shoulders and neck, around which she wore a double string of large pearls. She was a long time in settling herself, with a great rustling of her stiff silk dress.

Natasha found herself involuntarily gazing at that neck, those shoulders and pearls, and that head-dress, and she was amazed at their beauty. Just as Natasha was taking a second look at her, the lady glanced round, and, fixing her eyes on Count Ilya Andreyitch, nodded her head and smiled.

It was the Countess Bezukhaya, Pierre's wife.

Ilya Andreyitch, who knew every one in society, leaned over and spoke with her.

"Have you been here long, countess?" he inquired. "I'm coming in, I'm coming in soon to kiss your hand. I'm in town on business, and have got my girls with me. They say Semyonova plays her part superbly," said Ilya Andreyitch. "I hope Count Piotr Kirillovitch has not entirely forgotten us. Is he here?"

"Yes, he was intending to come," said Ellen, and she gave Natasha a scrutinizing look.

Count Ilya Andreyitch again sat back in his place. "Isn't she pretty, though?" asked he of Natasha.

"A perfect marvel," replied the latter. "I could understand falling in love with her."

By this time the last notes of the overture were heard, and the baton of the kapellmeister rapped upon the stand. Those gentlemen who were in late slipped down to their places, and the curtain rose.

As soon as the curtain went up, silence reigned in the parterre and the boxes, and all the gentlemen, young and old, whether in uniforms or in civilian's dress, and all the ladies, with precious stones glittering on their bare bosoms, with eager expectation turned their attention to the stage.

Natasha also tried to look.
CHAPTER IX

Smooth boards formed the center of the stage, on the sides stood painted canvases representing trees, in the background a cloth was stretched out on boards, in the foreground girls in red bodices and white petticoats were sitting around. One, who was exceedingly stout, wore a white silk dress. She sat by herself on a low footstool, to the back of which was glued green cardboard. They were all singing something. After they had finished their chorus the girl in white advanced toward the prompter’s box, and a man in silk tights on his stout legs, and with a feather and a dagger, joined her, and began to sing and wave his arms.

The man in the tights sang alone, then she sang, then they were both silent. The orchestra played, and the man began to turn down the fingers on the girl’s hand, evidently waiting for the beat when they should begin to sing their parts together. They sang a duet, and then all in the audience began to clap and to shout; and the man and woman on the stage, who had been representing lovers, got up, smiling, and, letting go of hands, bowed.

After her country life, and the serious frame of mind into which Natasha had lately fallen, all this seemed to her wild and strange. She was unable to follow the thread of the opera, and it was as much as she could do to listen to the music. She saw only painted canvas and oddly dressed men and women going through strange motions, talking and singing in a blaze of light. She knew what all this was meant to represent; but it all struck her as so affected, unnatural, and absurd, that some of the time she felt ashamed for the actors, and again she felt like laughing at them.

She looked around at the faces of the spectators, to see if she could detect in them any of this feeling of ridicule and perplexity which she felt; but all these faces were absorbed in what was taking place on the stage, or, as it seemed to Natasha, expressed a hypocritical enthusiasm.
"I suppose this must be very lifelike," said Natasha to herself. She kept gazing now at those rows of pomaded heads in the parterre, then at the half-naked women in the boxes, and most of all at her neighbor Ellen, who, as undressed as she could well be, gazed with a faint contented smile at the stage, not dropping her eyes, conscious of the brilliant light that overflowed the auditorium, and the warm atmosphere, heated by the throng.

Natasha gradually began to enter into a state of intoxication which she had not experienced for a long time. She had no idea who she was, or where she was, or of what was going on before her. She gazed, and let her thoughts wander at will, and the strangest, most disconnected ideas flashed unexpectedly through her mind. Now she felt inclined to leap on the edge of the box and sing the aria which the actress had just been singing, then she felt an impulse to tap with her fan a little old man who was sitting not far off, then again to lean over to Ellen and tickle her.

At one time, when there was perfect silence on the stage just before the beginning of an aria, the door that led into the parterre near where the Rostofs were seated creaked on its hinges, and a man who came in late was heard passing down to his seat.

"There goes Kuragin," whispered Shinshin.

The Countess Bezukhaya turned her head and smiled at the newcomer. Natasha followed the direction of the Countess Bezukhaya's eyes, and saw an extraordinarily handsome aide, who, with an air of extreme self-confidence, but at the same time of good breeding, was just passing by their box.

This was Anatol Kuragin, whom she had seen and noticed some time before at a ball in Petersburg. He now wore his aide's uniform, with epaulet and shoulder-knot. He advanced with a supreme air of youthful gallantry, which would have been ludicrous had he not been so handsome, and had his handsome face not worn such an expression of cordial good-humor and merriment.
Although it was during the act, he sauntered along the carpeted corridor, slightly jingling his spurs, and holding his perfumed, graceful head on high with easy grace. Glancing at Natasha, he joined his sister, laid his exquisitely gloved hand on the edge of her box, nodded to her, and bent over to ask some question in reference to Natasha.

"Mais charmante," said he, evidently referring to her. She understood less from hearing his words than from the motion of his lips.

Then he went forward to the front row and took his seat near Dolokhov, giving him a friendly, careless nudge with his elbow, though the others treated him with such worshipful consideration. The other, with a merry lifting of the eyebrows, gave him a smile, and put up his foot against the railing.

"How like brother and sister are!" said the count; "and how handsome they both are!"

Shinshin, in an undertone, began to tell the count some story about Kuragin's intrigues in Moscow, to which Natasha listened simply because he had spoken of her as charmante.

The first act was over. All in the parterre got up, mingled together, and began to go and come. Boris came to the Rostofs' box, received their congratulations very simply, and, smiling abstractedly and raising his brows, invited Natasha and Sonya, on behalf of his betrothed, to be present at their wedding, and then left them. Natasha, with a bright, coquettish smile, had talked with him and congratulated him on his engagement, although it was the same Boris with whom she had been in love only a short time before. This, in her intoxicated, excited state, seemed to her perfectly simple and natural.

The bare-bosomed Ellen sat near her, and showered her smiles indiscriminately on all, and in exactly the same way Natasha smiled on Boris.

Ellen's box was crowded by the cleverest and most influential men of the city, who also gathered around the front of it, on the parterre side, vying with one another, apparently, in their desire to let it be known that they were acquainted with her.

Kuragin, throughout that entr'acte, stood with Dolokhov, with his back to the stage, in the very front row, and kept his eyes fixed on the Rostofs' box. Natasha felt certain that he was talking about her, and it afforded her gratification. She even turned her head slightly, in a way which, in her opinion, best showed off the beauty of her profile.

Before the beginning of the second act, Pierre, whom the Rostofs had not seen since their arrival, made his appearance. His face was gloomy, and he was still more portly than when Natasha had last seen him. Without recognizing any one, he passed down to the front row. Anatol joined him, and began to make some remark, looking and pointing to the Rostofs' box. A flash of animation passed over Pierre's face as he caught sight of Natasha, and he hastily made his way across through the seats to where she was. Then, leaning his elbows on the edge of her box and smiling, he had a long conversation with her.

While she was talking with Pierre, she heard a man's voice in the Countess Bezukhaya's box, and something told her that it was Anatol Kuragin. She glanced round, and their eyes met. He almost smiled, and looked straight into her eyes with such an admiring, tender gaze that it seemed to her strange to be so near him, to see him, to be so sure that she pleased him, and yet not to be acquainted with him!

In the second act the stage represented a cemetery, and there was a hole in the canvas, which represented the moon, and the footlights were turned down, and the horns and contrabasses began to play in very deep tones, and the stage was invaded from both sides by a throng of men in black mantles. These men began to wave their arms, brandishing what seemed to be daggers. Then some other men rushed forward, and proceeded to drag away by main force that damsel who, in the previous act, had been dressed in white, but was now in a blue dress. But before they dragged her away, they sang with her for a long time, and at the sound of three thumps on something metallic behind the scenes, all fell on their knees and began to sing a prayer. A number of times all these actions were interrupted by the enthusiastic plaudits of the spectators.

Every time during this act that Natasha looked down into the parterre, she saw Anatol Kuragin, with his arm carelessly thrown across the back of his seat, and gazing at her. It was pleasant for her to feel that she had so captivated him, and it never entered her head that in all this there was anything improper.

When the second act was over, the Countess Bezukhaya stood up, leaned over to the Rostofs' box,—thereby exposing her whole bosom,—and with her gloved finger beckoned the old count to come to her; and then, paying no heed to those who came to her box to pay her their homage, she began a smiling, confidential conversation with him.

"You must certainly make me acquainted with your charming girls," said she; "the whole city are talking about them, and I don't know them."

Natasha got up and made a courtesy to this magnificent countess. The flattery of this brilliant beauty was so intoxicating to her that she blushed with pleasure and gratification.

"I mean to be a Muscovite also," said Ellen. "And aren't you ashamed of yourself to hide such pearls in the country?"

The Countess Bezukhaya had, by good rights, the reputation of being a fascinating woman. She could say the opposite of what she thought, and could flatter in the most simple and natural manner.

"Now, my dear count, you must allow me to see something of your daughter. Though I don't expect to be here very long,—you don't either, I believe,—I shall try to make them have a good time.—I heard a good deal about you in Petersburg, and I wanted to make your acquaintance," said she, turning to Natasha with her stereotyped, bewitching smile. "I heard about you from my 'page,' Drubetskoï,—have you heard, by the way, that he is engaged? — and from my husband's friend Bolkonsky, Prince Andrei Bolkonsky," said she, with especial emphasis, signifying thereby that she knew of his relations with Natasha. Then she proposed that, in order to become better acquainted, one of the young ladies should come over into her box for the rest of the performance, and Natasha went.

During the third act the scene represented a palace, wherein many candles were blazing, while on the walls hung paintings representing full-bearded knights. In the center stood, apparently, a tsar and tsaritsa. The tsar was gesticulating with his right hand, and, after singing something with evident timidity, and certainly very wretchedly, he took his seat on a crimson throne.

The damsel who at first had been dressed in white and then in blue was now in nothing but a shift, with disheveled hair, and stood near the throne. She was warbling some doleful ditty addressed to the tsaritsa, but the tsar peremptorily waved his hand, and from the side scenes came a number of bare-legged men and bare-legged women, and began to dance all together.

Then the fiddles played a very dainty and merry tune. One girl, with big bare legs and thin arms, coming out from among the others, went behind the scenes, and, having adjusted her corsage, came into the center of the stage, and began to caper about and knock her feet together.

The whole parterre clapped their hands and shouted, "Bravo!"

Then a man took his stand in one corner. The orchestra played louder than ever, with a clanging of cymbals and blare of horns, and this bare-legged man, alone by himself, began to make very high jumps and kick his feet together. This man was Duport, who earned sixty thousand rubles a year by his art. All in the parterre, in the boxes, and in the "upper paradise" began to thump and shout with all their might, and the man paused and smiled, and bowed to all sides. Then some others danced,—bare-legged men and women; then one of the royal personages shouted something with musical accompaniment, and all began to sing. But suddenly a storm arose. Chromatic scales and diminished sevenths were heard in the orchestra, and all scattered behind the scenes, carrying off with them again one of those who were behind the scenes as spectators, and the curtain fell.

Once more among the audience arose a terrible roar and tumult, and all, with enthusiastic faces, shouted at once, "Duport! Duport! Duport!"

Natasha no longer looked upon this as strange or unusual. With a sense of satisfaction she looked around her, smiling joyously.

"Is n't Duport admirable?" asked Ellen, turning to her.

"Oh, yes!" replied Natasha.

CHAPTER X

During the entr'acte a draught of cold air made its way into Ellen's box, the door was opened, and Anatol came in, bowing and trying not to disturb any one.

"Allow me to present my brother," said Ellen, uneasily glancing from Natasha to Anatol.

Natasha turned her pretty, graceful head toward the handsome young man, and smiled at him over her shoulder. Anatol, who was as good-looking near at hand as he was at a distance, sat down by her and said that he had been long wishing for the pleasure of her acquaintance,—ever since the Naruishkins' ball, where he had seen her, and never forgotten her.

Kuragin was far cleverer and less affected with women than he was in the society of men. He spoke fluently and simply, and Natasha had a strange and agreeable feeling of ease in the company of this man, about whom so many rumors were current. He was not only not terrible, but his face even wore an innocent, gay, and good-natured smile.
Kuragin asked her how she enjoyed the opera, and told her how Semyonova, at the last performance, had got a fall while on the stage.

"Do you know, countess," said he, suddenly addressing her as if she were an old acquaintance, "we have been arranging a fancy-dress party. You ought to take part in it. It will be very jolly. We shall all rendezvous at the Karagins'. Please come, won't you?" he insisted.

In saying this he did not once take his smiling eyes from her face, her neck, her naked arms. Natasha was not left in doubt of the fact that he admired her. This was agreeable, but somehow she felt constrained and troubled by his presence. When she was not looking at him, she was conscious that he was staring at her shoulders, and she involuntarily tried to catch his eyes, so that he might rather fix them on her face. But while she thus looked him in the eyes, she had a terrified consciousness that that barrier of modesty which, she had always felt before, kept other men at a distance, was down between him and her. Without being in the least able to explain it, she was conscious within five minutes that she was on a dangerously intimate footing with this man. When she looked away from him, she feared he might put his hand on her bare arm, or kiss her on the neck. They talked about the simplest matters, and yet she felt that they were more intimate than she had ever been with any other man. She looked at Ellen and at her father, as if asking them what all this meant; but Ellen was busily engaged in conversation with some general, and paid no heed to her imploring look, and her father's said nothing more to her than what it always said: "Happy? Well, I am glad of it."

During one of those moments of constraint, while Anatol's prominent eyes were calmly and boldly surveying her, Natasha, in order to break the silence asked him how he liked Moscow. Natasha asked the question, and blushed. It seemed to her all the time that she was doing something unbecoming in talking with him. Anatol smiled, as if to encourage her.

1 Karusel' kostumakh.

"At first I was not particularly charmed with Moscow, because what a city ought to have, to be agreeable, is pretty women; isn't that so? Well, now I like it very much," said he, giving her a significant look. "Will you come to our party, countess? Please do," said he; and, stretching out his hand toward her bouquet, and lowering his voice, he added in French, "You will be the prettiest. Come, my dear countess, and, as a pledge, give me that flower."

Natasha did not realize what he was saying any more than he did, but she had a consciousness that in his incomprehensible words there was an improper meaning. She knew not what reply to make, and turned away, pretending not to have heard him. But the instant that she turned away the thought came to her that he was there behind her, and so near.

"What is he doing now? Is he ashamed of himself? Is he angry? Is it my business to make amends?" she asked herself. She could not refrain from glancing round.

She looked straight into his eyes, and his nearness and self-possession, and the good-natured warmth of his smile, overcame her.

She gave him an answering smile, and gazed straight into his eyes, and once more she realized, with the feeling of horror, that there was no barrier between them.

The curtain again went up. Anatol left the box, calm and serene. Natasha rejoined her father in her own box, but already she was under the dominion of this world into which she had entered. Everything that passed before her eyes now seemed to her perfectly natural, while all her former thoughts concerning her lover, and the Princess Mariya, and her life in the country, vanished from her mind as if all that had taken place long, long ago.

In the fourth act there was a strange kind of devil, who sang and gesticulated until a trap beneath him was opened, and he disappeared. This was all that Natasha noticed during the fourth act. Something agitated and disturbed her, and the cause of this annoyance was Kuragin, at whom she could not help looking.

When they left the theater Anatol joined them, summoned their carriage, and helped them to get seated. As he was assisting Natasha, he squeezed her arm above the elbow. Startled and blushing, she looked at him. His brilliant eyes returned her gaze, and he gave her a tender smile.

Not until she reached home was Natasha able clearly to realize all that had taken place, and when she suddenly remembered Prince Andrei she was horror-struck; and as they all sat drinking tea she groaned aloud, and, flushing scarlet, ran from the room.

“My God! I am lost,” she said to herself. “How could I have let it go so far?” she wondered. Long she sat hiding her flushed face in her hands, striving to give herself a clear account of what had happened to her, and she could not do so, nor could she explain her feelings. Everything seemed to her dark, obscure, and terrible.

Then, in that huge, brilliant auditorium, where Duport, with his bare legs and his spangled jacket, capered about on the dampened boards to the sounds of music, and the girls and the old men and Ellen much décolletée, with her calm and haughty smile, were all applauding and enthusiastically shouting bravo,—there, under the protection of this same Ellen, everything was perfectly clear and simple; but now, alone by herself, it became incomprehensible.

“What does it mean? What means this fear that I experience in his presence? What mean these stings of conscience which I experience now?” she asked herself.

If only her mother had been there, Natasha would have made confession of all her thoughts, before going to bed that night. She knew that Sonya, with her strict and wholesome views, would either entirely fail to understand, or would be horrified by, her confession.
Natasha accordingly tried, by her own unaided efforts, to settle the question that tormented her.

"Have I really forfeited Prince Andrei's love, or not?" she asked herself, and then, with a reassuring smile, she replied to her own question:

"What a fool I am to ask this! What happened to me? Nothing. I have done nothing. I was not to blame for this. No one will know about it, and I shall not see him any more," said she to herself. "Of course it is evident no harm has been done; there's nothing to repent of, and no reason why Prince Andrei should not love me just as I am. But what do I mean by just as I am? O my God! my God! why is he not here?"

Natasha grew calm for an instant, but then some instinct told her that, even though nothing had happened and no harm had been done, still the first purity of her love for Prince Andrei was destroyed.

And once more she let her imagination bring up her whole conversation with Kuragin, and she recalled his face and his motions, and the tender smile that this handsome, impudent man had given her while he was squeezing her arm.

CHAPTER XI

Anatol Kuragin was living in Moscow because his father had sent him from Petersburg, where he had been spending more than twenty thousand rubles a year, and had accumulated heavy debts as well, which his creditors were trying to oblige his father to pay.

His father explained to him that he would, for the last time, pay one-half of his debts, but only on condition that he would go to Moscow as aide to the governor-general of the city, an appointment which he obtained for him, and would at last try to win the hand of some rich heiress. He suggested the Princess Mariya or Julie Karagina.

Anatol consented and went to Moscow, where he took up his residence at Pierre's. At first Pierre received him with scant welcome, but at length became accustomed to him, and occasionally accompanied him on his sprees, and, under the pretense of a loan, gave him money.

Anatol, as Shinshin correctly stated the case, had instantly turned the heads of all the young ladies in Moscow, and particularly because he neglected them, and openly neglected them, for gipsy girls and French actresses, with the leading light of whom, Mlle. Georges, it was said, he was on terms of close intimacy. He never failed of a single drinking-bout given by Danilof or the other fast men of Moscow; he could drink steadily from night till morning, out-drinking every one else; moreover, he was always present at all the balls and receptions in the upper circles of society. Rumors were rife of various intrigues of his with married ladies in Moscow, and at the balls he always paid particular court to several.

But from young ladies, particularly those who were rich and in the marriage market,—most of whom were excessively plain,—Anatol kept at a respectful distance, and this arose from the fact, known only to a very few of his most intimate friends, that he had been married two years before. Two years before, while his regiment had been cantoned in Poland, a Polish proprietor of a small estate had forced Anatol to marry his daughter.

Anatol had soon after abandoned his wife, and, by engaging to send money periodically, he persuaded his father-in-law to let him still pass as a bachelor.

Anatol was always satisfied with his situation, with himself, and with other people. He was instinctively, by his whole nature, convinced that it was entirely impossible for him to live otherwise than as he was living, and that he had never in his life done anything wrong. He was in no condition to ponder on the effect that his behavior might have on others, or what might be the result of his behaving in this, that, or the other way. He was persuaded that, just as the duck was so created as always to be in the water, in the same way he was created by God for the purpose of living with an income of thirty thousand rubles a year, and of occupying the highest pinnacle of society. He was so firmly grounded in this opinion, that other people also, when they saw him, shared in his conviction, and never thought of refusing him either the foremost place in society, or the money which he took of any one he met, without ever thinking of repaying it.

He was no gambler; at least, he never showed sordid love for gain. He was not ostentatious. It was absolutely a matter of indifference to him what men thought of him. Still less was he open to the charge of ambition. Many times he had annoyed his father by injuring his own prospects, and he always made sport of dignities. He was not stingy, and he never refused any one who asked a favor of him. All that he cared for was "a good time" and women, and as, according to his opinion, there was nothing ignoble in these tastes, and he could not calculate the consequence for other people of the gratification of these tastes of his, he therefore considered himself irreproachable, sincerely scorned ordinary scoundrels and base men, and held his head high with a tranquil conscience.

Debauchees, those male Magdalens, have a secret feeling of blamelessness, such as is peculiar to the frail sisterhood; and it is based on the same hope of forgiveness. "She shall be forgiven much, for she hath loved much; and he shall be forgiven much, because he hath enjoyed much."

Dolokhof, back again in Moscow, after his exile and his adventures in Persia, and once more leading a dissipated and luxurious life and playing high, naturally became intimate with his old Petersburg companion, Kuragin, and made use of him for his own ends.

Anatol really liked Dolokhof for his wit, intelligence, and audacity. Dolokhof, who found the name, the notability, and the connections of Anatol Kuragin an admirable decoy for attracting rich young fellows into his clutches, made use of him and got enjoyment out of him without letting him suspect it. Besides the financial purpose for which Anatol served him, the act itself of controlling the will of another was an enjoyment, a habit, and a necessity for Dolokhof.

Natasha had made a deep impression on Kuragin. At supper after the opera, with all the enthusiasm of a connoisseur, he praised to Dolokhof her arms, her shoulders, her ankles, and her hair, and he expressed his intention of making love to her. The possible conse-quinces of such love-making Anatol did not stop to consider; nor was it in him to foresee them any more than in any other of his escapades.

"Yes, she's pretty, my dear fellow; but she's not for us," said Dolokhof.

"I am going to tell my sister to invite her to dinner. — How's that?" suggested Anatol.

"You had better wait till she's married."....

"You know," said Anatol, "I adore young girls; you can turn their heads so quickly."

"You have already fallen into the hands of one young girl," said Dolokhof, who knew about Anatol's mar-rriage. "See?"

"Well, can't get caught a second time, — hey?" replied Anatol, good-naturedly laughing.

CHAPTER XII

The next day the Rostofs stayed at home, and no one came to see them. Marya Dmitrievna had a confidential conversation with her father, taking pains to keep it a secret from Natasha. Nevertheless she suspected that they were discussing the old prince, and concocting some scheme. It disquieted and humiliated her. She was every moment expecting Prince Andrei to come, and twice that day she sent the dvornik to the Bolkonskys' to learn if he had arrived. But he had not yet come.

It was now more trying to her than during the first days of his absence. Her impatience and melancholy thoughts about him were intensified by an unpleasant recollection of her interview with the Princess Mariya and the scene with the old prince, as well as by a vague and undefinable fear and uneasiness. She had a notion that either he would not come at all, or that before he came something would happen. She found it impossible, as before, to have calm and collected thoughts about him when alone by herself. As soon as her thoughts turned to him her recollections of him were confused by recollections of the old prince, of the Princess Mariya, of the operatic performance, and of Kuragin. Again the question arose whether she was to blame, whether her troth plighted to Prince Andrei were not already broken; and again she would picture to herself, even to the most trifling details, every word, every gesture, every slightest shadow in the play of expression on the face of that man who had succeeded in arousing in her such a terrible and inexplicable feeling.

In the eyes of the home circle, Natasha seemed livelier than usual, but she was far from being as calm and happy as she had been before.

On Sunday morning Marya Dmitrievna proposed to her guests to attend mass at the parish chapel of Uspenie na Mohiltsakh.

"I don't like these fashionable churches," said she, evidently priding herself on her independence. "God is everywhere One. We have an excellent pope, and deacon as well, and the service is well performed. What kind of worship is it to have concerts given in the choir? I don't like it. It's mischievous nonsense."

Marya Dmitrievna liked Sundays, and had them kept as high festivals. Her house was thoroughly washed and cleaned on Saturday; neither she nor the people within her gates did any work—they wore their best clothes, and all went to mass. On Sunday she had an extra fine dinner prepared, and her servants were provided with vodka and a roasted goose or a sucking pig.

But nothing in the whole house gave more decided evidence of its being a holiday than Marya Dmitrievna's broad, stern face, which on this occasion wore an unchangeable expression of solemn festivity.
After mass, while they were drinking their coffee in the drawing-room, where the furniture covers had been removed, a servant announced to Marya Dmitrievna that the carriage was at the door. She drew a long face, and, putting on her best shawl, in which she always paid visits, she got up and announced that she was going to see Prince Nikolai Andreyevitch Bolkonsky, to have an understanding with him in regard to Natasha.

After Marya Dmitrievna had taken her departure, a modiste from Madame Chalmé's came, and Natasha, retiring to the next room and shutting the door, occupied herself with trying on her new gowns and was very glad of the diversion.

Just as she had put on a hastily basted and still sleeveless waist, and was standing in front of the mirror, bending her head around to see how the back fitted, she heard in the drawing-room the lively tones of her father's voice, mingled with those of a woman, and it made her blush. It was Ellen's voice.

Natasha had not time to take off the experimental waist before the door opened, and into the room came the Countess Bezukhaya, beaming with a good-natured and flattering smile, and wearing a dark purple velvet dress, with a high collar.

"Ah, ma délicieuse!" she exclaimed to the blushing Natasha. "Charmante! No, she is quite unlike any one else, my dear count," said she, turning to the count, who followed her in. "The idea of living in Moscow and not going anywhere! No, I shall not let you off. This evening Mlle. Georges is going to recite for me, and we shall have a crowd, and if you don't bring your beauties, who are far better than Mlle. Georges, I shall never forgive you. My husband is away, he is gone to Tver; otherwise I should have sent him to persuade you. Do not fail to come. Don't fail—at ten o'clock."

She nodded to the dressmaker, whom she knew, and received a most respectful courtesy, and then sat down in an arm-chair near the mirror, picturesquely disposing the folds of her velvet dress. She did not cease to chatter with good-natured and merry volubility, constantly saying pleasant, flattering things about Natasha’s beauty. She examined her dresses and praised them, and also managed to say a good word for a new dress of her own, en gaz métallique — metallic gauze — which she had just received from Paris, and advised Natasha to get one like it.

“Besides, it would be extremely becoming to you, my charmer,” said she.

The smile of pleasure did not leave Natasha’s face. She felt happy and exhilarated by the praise of this gracious Countess Bezukhaya, who had heretofore seemed to her such an inaccessible, grand lady, and was now so cordial to her. Natasha’s spirits rose, and she felt almost in love with this woman, who was so beautiful and so good-natured.

Ellen, on her part, was sincerely enchanted by Natasha, and wanted her to have a good time. Anatol had urged her to help on his acquaintance with her, and it was for this purpose that she called on the Rostofs. The idea of helping her brother in such a flirtation was amusing to her.

Although that winter in Petersburg she had felt a grudge against Natasha for alienating Boris from her, it had now entirely passed from her mind; and, with all her heart, she felt kindly disposed toward Natasha. As she was taking her departure, she called her protégée aside:

“Last evening my brother dined with me — we almost died of laughing — he eats just nothing at all, and can only sigh for you, my charmer! He is in love, madly in love with you, ma chère.”

Natasha flushed crimson on hearing those words.

“How she blushed! How she blushed, ma délicieuse,” pursued Ellen. “Don’t fail to come. Even if you are in love, that is no reason for making a nun of yourself. Even if you are engaged, I am sure that your future husband would prefer to have you go into society, rather than die of tedium in his absence.”
“Of course she knows that I am engaged; of course she and her husband, she and Pierre, that good, honest Pierre, have talked and laughed about this,” said Natasha to herself. “Of course there is no harm in it.”

And again, under Ellen’s influence, all that hitherto seemed terrible to her seemed simple and natural.

“And she is such a grande dame, and so kind, and she seems to like me so heartily!” said Natasha to herself. “And why shouldn’t I have a good time?” queried Natasha, looking at Ellen with wide eyes full of amazement.

Marya Dmitrievna returned in time for dinner, silent and solemn, having evidently suffered a rebuff at the old prince’s. She was still laboring under too much excitement from her encounter to be able to give a calm account of it. To the count’s question, she replied that everything would be all right, and she would tell him about it the next day.

When she was informed of the Countess Bezukhaya’s visit, and the invitation for the evening, she said:—

“I don’t like the idea of your going to Bezukhaya’s, and I should advise you not to; however, if you have already promised, go; perhaps you will have some amusement,” she added, addressing Natasha.

CHAPTER XIII

Count Ilya Andreyitch took his young ladies to the Countess Bezukhaya’s.

The reception was fairly well attended, but the most of the company were strangers to Natasha. Count Ilya Andreyitch saw with dissatisfaction that the larger majority of those present consisted of men and women noted for their free and easy behavior.

Mlle. Georges stood in one corner of the drawing-room surrounded by young men. There were a number of Frenchmen, and among them Métivier, who since Ellen’s arrival had become an intimate at her house. Count Ilya Andreyitch decided not to take a hand at the card-table, or to leave the girls, but to take his departure as soon as Mlle. Georges had finished her recitation.

Anatol was at the door, evidently on the lookout for the Rostofs. As soon as he had exchanged greetings with the count, he joined Natasha, and followed her into the room. The moment she saw him, she was assailed, just as she had been at the theater, by a mixed sense of gratified vanity that she pleased him, and of fear, because of the absence of moral barriers between her and him.

Ellen received Natasha effusively, and was loud in praise of her beauty and her toilet.

Soon after their arrival, Mlle. Georges retired from the room to change her costume. In the meantime, chairs were arranged in the drawing-room, and the guests began to take their seats. Anatol procured a chair for Natasha, and was just going to sit next her; but the count, keeping a sharp eye on his daughter, took the seat next her. Anatol sat behind.

Mlle. Georges, with plump and dimpled arms all bare, and with a red shawl flung across one shoulder, came out into the space around which the chairs were ranged, and assumed an unnatural pose. A murmur of admiration was heard.

Mlle. Georges threw a stern and gloomy glance around, and began to recite certain lines in French, in which the guilty love of a mother for her son is delineated. In places she raised her voice; then, again, she spoke in a whisper, triumphantly tossing her head; and in other places she broke short off, or spoke in deep, hoarse tones, rolling her eyes.

"Adorable!".... "Divin!".... "Délicieux!" were the encomiums heard on all sides.

Natasha's eyes were fastened on the stout actress, but she heard nothing, saw nothing, understood nothing, of what was going on before her; she felt that she was irrevocably drawn again into that strange, mad world, so far removed from the past world, where it was impossible to know what was right and what was wrong.
what was reasonable and what was foolish. Behind her sat Anatol, and she was conscious of his nearness, and with terror awaited what might happen.

After the first monologue, the whole company arose and crowded around Mlle. Georges, expressing their enthusiasm.

"How beautiful she is!" said Natasha to her father, who had got up with the rest, and was starting to push his way through the throng toward the actress.

"I cannot think so when I look at you," said Anatol, sitting down next Natasha. He spoke so that she only could hear what he said: "You are charming.... Since the first moment that I saw you, I have not ceased...."

"Come, let us go, Natasha," interrupted the count, returning to his daughter. "How pretty she is!"

Natasha, making no reply, followed her father, but gave Anatol a look of wondering amazement.

After several more recitations, Mlle. Georges took her departure, and the Countess Bezukhaya invited her guests into the ball-room.

The count wanted to go home, but Ellen begged him not to spoil her improvised ball. The Rostofs remained. Anatol took Natasha out for a waltz; and while they were on the floor, and he clasped her waist and hand, he told her that she was ravissante, and that he loved her.

During the Écossaise, which she danced with Kuragin also, Anatol said nothing to her while they were by themselves, but merely gazed at her. Natasha was in doubt whether she had not dreamed what he said to her during the waltz.

At the end of the first figure he again pressed her hand. Natasha lifted startled eyes to his; but his look and his smile had such an expression of self-confidence and flattering tenderness that she found it impossible to look at him and say to him what was on her tongue to say. She dropped her eyes.

"Do not say such things to me; I am betrothed—I love another," she hurriedly whispered.
She glanced at him. Anatol was not in the least confused or chagrined at what she said.

"Don’t speak to me about that. What difference does it make to me?" he asked. "I tell you I am madly, madly in love with you. Am I to blame because you are bewitching?.... It's our turn to lead."

Natasha, excited and anxious, looked around with wide, frightened eyes, and gave the impression of being gayer than usual. She remembered almost nothing of what took place that evening. While they were dancing the Écossaise and the grossvater, her father came and urged her to go home with him, but she begged to stay a little longer.

Wherever she was, whoever engaged her in conversation, she was conscious all the time of his eyes upon her. Afterwards she remembered asking her father's permission to go to the dressing-room to adjust her dress, and how Ellen followed her, and told her with a laugh that her brother was in love with her. She remembered how, in the little divan-room, she had again met Anatol, how Ellen had suddenly disappeared, leaving her alone with him, and how Anatol, seizing her hand, had said, in a tender voice:—

"I cannot call on you, but must I never see you? I love you madly, desperately! Can I not see you?".... And then, blocking her way, he had bent down his face close to her face.

His great, gleaming, masculine eyes were so near to her face that she could see nothing else except those eyes of his.

"Natali?" she heard his voice whisper, with a questioning inflection, and her hand was squeezed almost painfully.

"Natali?"

"I do not understand at all; I have nothing to say," said her glance.

His glowing lips approached her lips—but at that instant she felt that her deliverance had come, for the sound of Ellen's footsteps and rustle of her dress were heard in the room.
Natasha glanced at Ellen; then, blushing and trembling, she gave him a terrified, questioning look, and started for the door.

"One word, only one, in God's name!" said Anatol. She paused. She felt that it was a necessity for her to hear that "single word," which would afford her an explanation of what had happened, and allow her something tangible to answer.

"Natali, one word, only one," he kept repeating, evidently not knowing what to say; and he repeated it until Ellen came close to him.

Ellen and Natasha returned together to the drawing-room. Declining the invitation to stay to supper, the Rostofs went home.

That night Natasha could not sleep at all. She was tormented by the puzzling question, which she loved, Anatol or Prince André? She loved Prince André,—she had a very distinct remembrance of how warmly she loved him.

But she loved Anatol also, there could be no doubt about that. "Otherwise, how could all this have taken place?" she asked herself. "If it was possible for me, on saying good-by to him, to answer his smiles with smiles,—if I could permit myself to go so far, then of course I was in love with him at first sight. He certainly is good and noble and handsome, and it is impossible not to be in love with him. What can I do when I love him and love the other too?" she asked herself, and found no solution to the terrible problem.

CHAPTER XIV

Morning came, with its occupations and bustle. All arose, stirred about, engaged in talk; once more the modistes came; again Marya Dmitrievna appeared and summoned them down to tea.

Natasha, with wide-open eyes, as if trying to anticipate and intercept every glance fixed upon her, looked anxiously about, and struggled to seem the same as usual.
After breakfast, which was her favorite time, Marya Dmitrievna sat down in her easy-chair, and called Natasha and the old count to her.

"Well,"—with strong emphasis on the word,—"well, my friends, now I have thought the whole matter over, and this is my advice," she began. "Yesterday, as you know, I went to see Prince Nikolai. Well," again with strong emphasis, "I had an interview with him. He thought to shout me down, but I am not to be shouted down so easily. I had it all out with him."

"Well, what did he do?" asked the count.

"What did he do?" He is a raving maniac.... won't listen to anything. Well, what's the use of talking? And, meanwhile, we are tormenting this poor girl so!" said Marya Dmitrievna. "And my advice to you is to transact your business, and go home.... to Otradnoye.... and there wait till...."

"Oh, no!" cried Natasha.

"Yes, you must go," maintained Marya Dmitrievna, "and wait there. If your betrothed should come here now, there would infallibly be a quarrel; but if he is left alone with the old man they will talk the whole thing over calmly, and then he will come for you."

Ilya Andreyitch approved of this plan, which instantly appealed to his good judgment. If the old prince was appeased, then they could rejoin him at Moscow or Luisiya Gorui; if not, as it would be contrary to his wishes, then the wedding could take place at Otradnoye.

"That is true as gospel," said he. "Only I am sorry that I went there and took her," said the old count.

"There's nothing to be sorry for. As long as you were here you couldn't help paying him that mark of respect. Well, if he does not approve, it is his affair," said Marya Dmitrievna, making search for something in her reticule. "Besides, the trousseau is all ready, so what have you to wait for? And what is n't ready I will send to you. Indeed, I am sorry about it, but you would be much better off to return—and God be with you!"

Having succeeded in finding what she was searching for, she handed it to Natasha. It was a letter from the Princess Mariya.

"She's written to you. How she torments herself, poor soul! She is afraid you will imagine she does not like you."

"Well, and she does n't like me," said Natasha.

"Nonsense! Don't say such a thing!" cried Marya Dmitrievna.

"I take no one's opinion. I know she does not like me," said Natasha, boldly, snatching the letter, and her face assumed such an expression of hard and angry determination that it caused Marya Dmitrievna to look at her more closely, and frown.

"Don't you contradict me that way, matushka," said she. "What I tell you is the truth. Go and reply to her letter."

Natasha made no rejoinder, and retired to her own room to read the Princess Mariya's letter.

The princess wrote that she was in despair, owing to the misunderstanding that had arisen between them. Whatever were her father's feelings, she wrote, she besought Natasha to be assured that it was impossible for her not to love her, as the choice of her brother, for whose happiness she was ready to sacrifice everything.

"Moreover," she wrote, "do not imagine that my father was unkindly disposed toward you. He is old and feeble, and you must excuse him; but he is good and generous, and will not fail to love the one who can make his son happy."

The Princess Mariya further asked Natasha to appoint a time when they could have another meeting.

After reading the letter through, Natasha sat down at the writing-desk to pen a reply.

"Chère princesse," she wrote, hastily and mechanically, and paused. What more could she write, after all that had taken place the evening before?

"Yes, yes, all that is past, and now, already, everything is different," she said to herself, as she pondered over the letter thus begun. "Ought I to break our engagement? Is it really my duty? It is frightful!"

And, to escape from these terrible thoughts, she went to Sonya, and began to help her pick out her embroidery patterns.

After dinner Natasha again retired to her room, and took up the Princess Mariya's letter.

"Can it be that all is really over between us?" she mused. "Can it be that this has happened so quickly, and that all that is past is completely annihilated?"

She recalled, in all its intensity, her love for Prince Andrei, and yet, at the same time, she felt that she was in love with Kuragin. She vividly pictured herself as Prince Andrei's wife, and recalled those dreams of happiness with him which she had so many times enjoyed in imagination, and at the same time, fired with passionate emotions, she recalled every detail of her last meeting with Anatol.

"Why could it not be possible to love them both at once?" she more than once asked herself, in the depths of perplexity. "Then only could I be perfectly happy; but now I must choose, and I cannot be happy to be deprived of either of them. One thing is certain," she thought, "to tell Prince Andrei what has happened, or to hide it from him, is impossible. But as far as he is concerned no harm has been done. Can I break off forever, though, with that delicious love for Prince Andrei, to whom my life has been devoted so long?"

"Baruishnya," said a maid, in a whisper, and coming into the room with a mysterious face, "a little man told me to give you this."

The maid handed her a note. "Only for Christ's sake...." she exclaimed, as Natasha, without thinking, mechanically broke the seal and began to read. It was a love-letter from Anatol, and, while she did not comprehend a word of it, she comprehended enough to know that it was from him, from the man she loved. Yes, she loved him, else how could happen what had happened? How could she have in her hand a love-letter from him?

With trembling hands Natasha held this passionate love-letter, composed for Anatol by Dolokhof, and in reading it she found it contained what corresponded to everything which it seemed to her she herself felt.

"Last evening decided my fate; you must love me or I die. I have no other alternative." So the letter began. Then he proceeded to say that he knew her parents would not consent to her marriage to him for various secret reasons which he could reveal to her alone, but that if she loved him, it was enough to say the little word yes, and no mortal power could suffice to destroy their bliss. Love conquers all. He would spirit her away, and fly with her to the ends of the earth.

"Yes, yes, I love him," mused Natasha, as she read the letter over for the twentieth time, and tried to discover some peculiarly deep meaning in every word.

That evening Marya Dmitrievna was going to the Arkharofs', and she invited the young ladies to accompany her. Natasha, under the pretext of a headache, remained at home.

CHAPTER XV

Sonya, on her return late that evening, went to Natasha's room, and, to her amazement, found her still dressed, and asleep on the divan. On the table near her lay Anatol's letter, wide open. Sonya picked the letter up, and began to read it.

She read it, and gazed at the sleeping Natasha, trying to discover in her face some key to the mystery of what she had read, and finding none. The expression of Natasha's face was calm, sweet, and happy.

Sonya, pale, and trembling with fright and emotion, clutching her breast lest she should choke, sat down in an easy-chair and melted into tears.

"How is it I have seen nothing of this? How can this have gone so far? Is it possible she has ceased to love Prince Andrei? And how can she tolerate this Kuragin? He is a deceiver and a scoundrel — that is evident. What will Nicolas do, dear, noble Nicolas, when he learns of this? So this is what has caused her agitation and unnatural behavior for the last three days,” said Sonya to herself. “But it is impossible that she is in love with him. Most likely she opened the letter without knowing from whom it came. In all probability she was offended. She could n’t have done such a thing knowingly.”

Sonya wiped away her tears, and went close to Natasha, and scrutinized her face.
“Natasha!” she murmured, almost inaudibly.
Natasha awoke and looked at Sonya.
“Ah, are you back already?”
And in the impulse of the sudden awakening she gave her friend a warm and affectionate hug, but, instantly noticing that Sonya’s face was troubled, her face also became troubled and suspicious.
“Sonya, have you been reading that letter?” she asked.
“Yes,” murmured Sonya.
Natasha smiled triumphantly.
“No, Sonya, it is impossible to hold out any longer,” said she. “I cannot hide it from you any more. You know, we love each other. .... Sonya, my darling, he has written me .... Sonya ....”

Sonya, not believing her own ears, stared at Natasha with open eyes.
“But Bolkonsky!” she exclaimed.
“Akh! Sonya—akh! if you could only know how happy I am!” cried Natasha. “You can’t imagine what such love is....”
“But, Natasha, do you mean to say that the other is all at an end?”

Natasha gazed at Sonya with wide-open eyes, as if she did not understand her question.
“What, have you broken with Prince Andrei?” demanded Sonya.
“Akh! you can’t comprehend it; don’t talk nonsense. Listen to me,” said Natasha, with a flash of ill-temper.
“No, I cannot believe this,” insisted Sonya. “I cannot understand it. How can you have loved one man a whole year, and then suddenly.... Why, you have only seen him three times! Natasha, I don't believe you. You are joking! In three days to forget everything? and so...."

"Three days!" interrupted Natasha. "It seems to me I have loved him a hundred years. It seems to me I have never loved any one else before him. You cannot comprehend it. Sonya, wait; sit down!" Natasha threw her arms around her, and kissed her. "I have been told, and you have probably heard, that such love as this existed; but now for the first time I experience it. It is not like the one before. The moment I set eyes on him, I felt that he was my master, that I was his slave, and that I could not help loving him. Yes, his slave! Whatever he commands me, I obey him. You can't understand that. What can I do? What can I do, Sonya?" pleaded Natasha, with a happy, frightened face.

"But just think what you are doing," insisted Sonya. "I cannot let this go on. This clandestine correspondence! How could you permit him to go so far?" asked she, with a horror and aversion which she tried in vain to hide.

"I have told you," replied Natasha, "that I have no will about it! Why can't you understand? I love him!"

"Then I will not let it go any farther. I shall tell the whole story," cried Sonya, with a burst of tears.

"For God's sake.... I beg of you.... if you tell, you are my enemy!" exclaimed Natasha. "Do you wish me to be unhappy? Do you wish to separate us...."

Seeing how passionately excited Natasha was, Sonya shed tears of shame and regret for her friend.

"But what has passed between you?" she asked. "What has he said to you? Why does he not come to the house?"

Natasha made no reply to this question.

"For God's sake, Sonya, don't tell any one, don't torment me," entreated Natasha. "Remember, it's never right to interfere in such matters. I have trusted you...."

"But why all this secrecy? Why does n’t he come to the house?" insisted Sonya. "Why does he not openly ask for your hand? You know Prince Andrei gave you absolute freedom, if such were the case; but I don’t believe in this man. Natasha, have you considered what his secret reasons may be?"

Natasha gazed at Sonya with wondering eyes. Evidently this question had not occurred to her before, and she knew not what answer to make.

"What reasons? I don’t know. But of course there must be reasons."

Sonya sighed, and shook her head incredulously.

"If there were reasons...." she began; but Natasha, foreseeing her objections, with frightened eagerness interrupted her.

"Sonya, it is impossible to doubt him, impossible, wholly impossible, do you understand?" she cried.

"Does he love you?"

"Love me!" repeated Natasha, with a smile of contemptuous pity for her friend’s incredulity. "You have read his letter, you have seen him, have you not?"

"But if he were a dishonorable man?"

"He!.... a dishonorable man! If you knew him!" exclaimed Natasha.

"If he were an honorable man, then he ought either to explain his intentions, or else cease to see you; and if you are not willing to do this, then I shall. I shall write him, I shall tell your papa," said Sonya, decidedly.

"But I cannot live without him," cried Natasha.

"Natasha, I don’t understand you! What are you saying? Think of your father, think of Nicolas."

"I want no one, I love no one but him! How dare you assert that he is dishonorable? Don’t you know that I love him?" cried Natasha. "Sonya, go, I don’t wish to quarrel with you! go away, for God’s sake, go away! you see how tormented I am," she screamed in a voice of repressed anger and despair. Sonya began to sob, and rushed from the room.

Natasha went to her writing-table, and without pausing a moment wrote the letter to the Princess Mariya which she had not been able to write the morning before. In this letter she laconically informed the princess that all misunderstandings were at an end, that taking advantage of Prince Andrei's generosity in giving her perfect freedom, she begged her to forget all that had happened, and to forgive her if she had been to blame in respect to her; but that she could never be his wife. At that moment all seemed to her so easy, simple, and clear!

The Rostofs were to start for the country on Friday, and on Wednesday the count went with an intending purchaser to his pod-Moskovnaya estate.

On the day of the count's trip, Sonya and Natasha were invited to a great dinner at the Kuragins', and Marya Dmitrievna went as their chaperon.

At this dinner Natasha again met Anatol, and Sonya observed that Natasha had with him some mysterious conversation, which she evidently wished not to be overheard; and during all the dinner-time she seemed to be more agitated than ever. On their return home, Natasha was the first to begin the explanation which her friend was anxious for.

"There, Sonya, you have said all sorts of foolish things about him," Natasha began, in a cajoling tone, such as children use when they want to be flattered. "He and I came to a clear understanding to-day."

"Now, what do you mean? What did he say, Natasha? How glad I am that you are not angry with me! Tell me all, tell me the whole story. What did he say to you?"

Natasha pondered.

"Akh! Sonya, if you only knew him as I do.... he said.... he asked me what sort of an engagement I had with Bolkonsky. He was delighted that it depended on me to break it off."
Sonya sighed mournfully.

"But you have n't broken your engagement with Bol- konsky, have you?"

"Well, perhaps I have broken my engagement with Bolkonsky! Perhaps it is all at an end! What makes you have such hard thoughts of me?"

"I have no hard thoughts of you; only I can't under- stand this ...."

"Wait, Sonya, and you will understand the whole thing. You will learn what a man he is! But don't harbor hard thoughts of me, or of him either."

"I harbor no hard thoughts of any one; I love you and I am sorry for you all. But what am I to do?"

Sonya, however, was not blinded by the affectionate manner in which Natasha treated her. The more gentle and insinuating Natasha's face grew, the more stern and serious became Sonya's face.

"Natasha," said she, "you yourself begged me not to say any more about this to you, and I have not; and now you reopen it yourself. Natasha, I have no faith in him. Why all this mystery?"

"There you begin again!" interposed Natasha.

"Natasha, I am afraid for you."

"Afraid of what?"

"I am afraid that you are going to your ruin," said Sonya, in a resolute voice, frightened herself at what she said.

An angry look again came into Natasha's face.

"I will go to my ruin, I certainly will, and the faster the better. It's no affair of yours. It won't hurt you, even if it does hurt me. Leave me, leave! I hate you!"

"Natasha!" expostulated Sonya, in dismay.

"I hate you! I hate you! We can never be friends any more!"

Natasha rushed out of the room.

Natasha had nothing more to say to Sonya, and avoided her. With that peculiar expression of nervous preoccupation and guilt, she wandered up and down the rooms, trying one occupation after another, and instantly abandoning them.
Hard as this was for Sonya, she did not let her out of her sight for a single moment, but followed her everywhere she went.

On the day before the count's return, Sonya observed that Natasha spent the whole morning at the parlor window, as if in expectation of some one, and that she made some sort of signal to an officer who drove by, and who Sonya thought must have been Anatol.

Sonya began to observe her friend still more closely, and remarked that during all dinner-time and throughout the evening, Natasha was in a strange and unnatural state of excitement, answering at random the questions that were asked her, beginning and not finishing sentences, and laughing at everything.

After tea, Sonya saw a timid chambermaid watching for her at Natasha's door. She let her pass in, and listening at the keyhole discovered that she was the bearer of another letter.

And suddenly it became clear to Sonya that Natasha had some terrible plan on foot for that evening. Sonya knocked loudly at her door. Natasha refused to admit her.

"She is going to elope with him!" said Sonya to herself. "She is quite ready for anything. Her face to-day had a peculiarly pitiful and determined expression. She wept when she said good-by to her father," Sonya remembered. "Yes, it is evident that she is going to elope with him! What can I do about it?" she mused, recalling all of the circumstances that now made her think Natasha had adopted some terrible resolution.

"The count is away. What can I do? Write to Kuragin and demand of him an explanation? But who would make him reply to it? Write to Pierre, as Prince Andrei told me to do in case of misfortune?.... But perhaps she has already broken with Bolkonsky! Certainly Natasha sent her letter to the princess last evening. .... If her father were only here!"

It seemed terrible to tell Marya Dmitrievna, who had such confidence in Natasha. "But what else can I do?" mused Sonya, as she stood in the dark corridor. "Now or never is the time to show that I am grateful to this dear family, and that I love Nicolas. No! even if I have to stay awake for three nights, I will not leave this corridor, and I will detain her by main force; and I will not allow any scandal to happen to this family," she said to herself.

CHAPTER XVI

Anatol had recently transferred his lodgings to Dolokhof's house. The plan of abducting the young countess had been suggested and arranged by Dolokhof some days before, and on that day when Sonya, listening at Natasha's door, had determined to protect her, this scheme was all ready to be carried into execution.

Natasha had agreed to meet Kuragin at ten o'clock that evening, at the rear entrance. Kuragin was to place her in a troika which should be in waiting, and carry her sixty versts to the village of Kamienko, where an unfrocked pope would be in readiness to perform a mock marriage ceremony. At Kamienko a relay would be ready to take them toward Warsaw, and thence by regular stages they would make their escape abroad.

Anatol had his passport and his padorozhnaya, or order for post-horses, and ten thousand rubles obtained from his sister, and ten thousand obtained through Dolokhof's mediation.

Two witnesses — Khvostikof, formerly a law clerk, who was now a creature of Dolokhof's, and Makarin, a hussar on the retired list, a weak and good-natured fellow who had an inordinate affection for Kuragin — were sitting in the front room over their tea.

In Dolokhof's large cabinet, the walls of which were hung from floor to ceiling with Persian rugs, bearskins, and weapons, sat Dolokhof himself, in a traveling beshmet and top-boots, before an open desk, on which lay bills and packages of money. Anatol, in his uniform, unbuttoned, came in from the room where the two witnesses were sitting, and was passing through the cabinet into the adjoining room, where his French valet and another servant were packing up the last remaining effects.

Dolokhov was making out the accounts and writing the amounts on a sheet of paper.

"Well!" said he, "you will have to give two thousand to Khvostikof."

"All right, give it to him!" said Anatol.

"Makarka"—this was an affectionate nickname for Makarin—"is so disinterested that he would go through fire and water for you. There now, the accounts are all made out," said Dolokhov, calling his attention to the paper. "Is that right?"

"Yes, of course it is," said Anatol, evidently not heeding what was said, and looking into vacancy with a dreamy expression, and a smile that did not leave his face.

Dolokhov shut the desk with a slam, and turned to Kuragin with an amused smile:—

"But see here, now! you’d better give this up; there’s still time," said he.

"Fool! durak!" said Anatol, "stop talking nonsense. If you only knew!.... But only the devil knows what this is to me!"

"Honestly! Throw it up!" said Dolokhov. "I’ll tell you the honest truth. Do you imagine that this is a joke that you are going into?"

"There you are stirring me up again. Go to the devil," exclaimed Anatol, scowling; "I have no time to listen to your idiotic twaddle!"

And he started to leave the room.

Dolokhov smiled scornfully and condescendingly as Anatol turned away.

"Wait," he cried after him, "I am not joking, I am telling you the truth; come here, come here, I say!"

Anatol came back into the room again, and trying to concentrate his attention, gazed at Dolokhov, apparently quite under the influence of his will.

"Listen to me, I speak for the last time. Why should I jest with you? Have I done anything to thwart you? Who is it that has made all the arrangements for you?
who found your priest for you, who procured your passport, who got the money for you? Have n't I done the whole thing?"

"Yes, and I thank you. Do you imagine I am not grateful?"

Anatol sighed and embraced his friend.

"I have been helping you; but it is my place to tell you the truth: it is a dangerous game, and if it misses fire, a stupid one. Suppose you elope with her — well and good. What will be the next step? It will be discovered that you are married. You will be prosecuted as a criminal...."

"Akh! what nonsense! what stupid nonsense!" cried Anatol, frowning again. "Have I not told you again and again? Hey?"

And Anatol, with that peculiar passion for argument characteristic of men of small intellects, when they want to show their wit, reiterated the considerations which he had laid before Dolokhof a hundred times.

"I have told you again and again; my mind is made up: if this marriage is invalid," said he, doubling over his finger, "of course I am not responsible for it; well, then, suppose it is valid; it 's just the same, and, when we are abroad, no one will know the difference; that 's a fact, is it not? So say no more, say no more, say no more!"

"But, really, give it up! You will only get yourself into a scrape...."

"Go to the devil!" screamed Anatol, and, tearing his hair, he rushed into the next room; then he came straight back, and sat down astride of a chair in front of Dolokhof. "The devil only knows what this is to me! Hey? Just see, how it beats!" He took Dolokhof's hand and put it on his heart. "Ah! what an ankle! my dear, what eyes! she 's a goddess! Hey?"

Dolokhof, smiling unsympathetically, looked at him out of his handsome, impudent eyes, evidently feeling inclined to have a little more sport out of him.

"Well, but when your money is gone, what then?"

"What then? Hey?" repeated Anatol, with a touch of genuine distress at the thought of the future. "What then? I am sure I don't know. But what is the use of talking nonsense?" He looked at his watch. "It's time."

Anatol went into the next room. "Hurry up, there! Are n't you almost ready? What are you dawdling so for?" he cried, addressing the servants.

Dolokhof put up the money, and, shouting to his man to have a luncheon of eatables and drinkables prepared for the travelers for their journey, he went into the room where Khvostikof and Makarin were waiting.

Anatol had flung himself down on the ottoman in the cabinet, and, with his head resting on his hand, was dreamily smiling and whispering tender words.

"Come and have something to eat. Have a drink, then!" cried Dolokhof, from the next room.

"I don't wish anything," replied Anatol, still with the smile on his handsome lips.

"Come, Balaga is here!"

Anatol got up and went into the dining-room. Balaga was a famous troïka driver, who, for half a dozen years, had known Dolokhof and Anatol, and had furnished them with their troïkas. More than once, when Anatol's regiment had been at Tver, he had started at nightfall from Tver, set him down in Moscow before daybreak, and brought him back by the following morning. More than once he had taken Dolokhof out of the reach of pursuers. More than once he had taken them out to drive with gipsies and damotlhi, —nice little dames, — as Balaga called fast women. More than once at their instigation he had run down pedestrians and izvoshchiks in the Moscow streets, and always his "gentlemen," as he called them, had rescued him from the penalty. More than one horse he had broken down in their service. More than once he had been thrashed by them; many times had they given him champagne and Madeira, which he specially affected, and he knew of escapades of theirs which would have condemned any ordinary man to Siberia.

During their orgies, they had often invited Balaga to take part, and made him drink and dance with the gipsies, and more than one thousand rubles of theirs had passed through his hands.

In service for them, he had twenty times a year risked life and limb, and in accomplishing their devilry he had almost killed more horses than their money would ever pay for. But he was fond of them; he was fond of that mad pace of eighteen versts an hour; he was fond of upsetting some harmless izvoshchik from his box, or running down some pedestrian on the street-crossings, and of dashing at full tilt down the Moscow streets. He was fond of hearing behind him that wild cry of drunken voices, "Pashol! pashol!" when it was already a physical impossibility for his horses to carry them a step further; he was fond of winding his whip-lash around a peasant's neck, who shrank back more dead than alive as he passed by. "Real gentlemen," he called them!

Anatol and Dolokhof also were fond of Balaga because of his masterly skill in handling the lines, and because his tastes were similar to theirs. With others he drove hard bargains, charging twenty-five rubles for a two hours' outing, and he himself rarely condescended to drive others, but more frequently sent one of his subordinates. But with his "gentlemen," as he called them, he himself always went, and never charged for his extra labor. Only when he learned through the valets that money was plentiful, he would come, after an interval of many months, and, very soberly and obsequiously, bowing low, would ask to be helped out of his difficulties. His "gentlemen" always made him take a seat.

"You will excuse me, batyushka Feodor Ivanuitch," or "your illustriousness," he would say, "I am entirely out of horses; I pray you to advance me enough to go to get more at the Yarmanka." ¹

And Anatol and Dolokhof, if they happened to be in funds, would give him a thousand or so of rubles.

Balaga was twenty-seven years old, a stubbed, red-haired, snub-nosed muzhik, with fiery red complexion, and still more fiery red neck, with glittering little eyes, and a scrubby beard. He wore a fine, blue, silk-lined kaftan, and over that a sheepskin polushubka.

¹ Yarmanka for Yarmarka, Jahrmarkt, annual market.

He crossed himself, turning to the shrine corner, as he came in, and advanced toward Dolokhov, holding out a small, black hand.

"Feodor Ivanovitch, your good health," he exclaimed, with a low bow.

"How are you, brother!.... There he is!"

"Good health, your illustriousness," said he, addressing Anatol, who came in at that moment, and offered him also his dirty hand.

"I ask you, Balaga," said Anatol, clapping his hand on his shoulder, "do you love me, or not, hey? Now there's a chance for you to prove it.... What horses have you come with, hey?"

"Those your man ordered, your own wild ones," said Balaga.

"Now see here, Balaga. No matter if you slaughter all three of your horses, provided you get us there within three hours. Hey?"

"If we slaughter them, how shall we get there?" replied Balaga, with a wink.

"I'll smash your snout for you! A truce to joking," cried Anatol, suddenly, with glaring eyes.

"Who's joking?" exclaimed the driver, with a laugh.

"Do I ever grudge anything for my 'gentlemen'? Whatever my horses can show in the way of speed, that we will do."

"Ah!" grunted Anatol. "Sit down, then."

"Yes, why not sit down?" said Dolokhof.

"I will stand, Feodor Ivanovitch."

"Sit down, no nonsense. Have a drink," said Anatol, and poured him out a great glass of Madeira. The driver's eyes flashed at the sight of the wine. Refusing at first, for manners' sake, he drank it down, and wiped his mouth with a red silk handkerchief which he kept in the top of his hat.

"Well, when shall we start, your illustriousness?"

"Let me see," Anatol glanced at his watch; "start pretty soon now. See here, Balaga, hey! You will get there on time?"

"Well, it depends on the start. If we get off luckily, then we'll be there in good time. I got you to Tver once,—went there in seven hours. Don't you remember, your illustriousness?"

"Do you know, one Christmas we started from Tver," said Anatol, smiling at the remembrance, and turning to Makarin, who was gazing affectionately at Kuragin with all his eyes. "You would n't believe it, Makarka, we flew so that it quite took away my breath. We came upon a file of carts, and jumped right over two of them. Hey?"

"What horses those were!" interposed Balaga, taking up the thread of the story. "At that time I put in two young side horses with the bay shaft-horse," he said, turning to Dolokhof. "You would hardly believe it, Feodor Ivanuitch, those wild creatures actually flew for sixty versts. It was impossible to hold them. My hands were numb, it was so cold. I threw down the lines. 'Look out for yourself, your illustriousness,' said I, and I rolled over backward into the sledge. It was hopeless to control 'em, or even to stick to my seat. The devils got us there in three hours. Only the left off one was winded."

CHAPTER XVII

Anatol left the room, and at the end of a few minutes came back in a sable shubka, girdled with a silver-buckled leather belt, and wearing a sable cap, jauntily set on one side, and very becoming to his handsome face. Glancing into the mirror, and then taking the same posture before Dolokhof which the mirror had told him was most effective, he seized a glass of wine.

"Well, Fedya, good-by — prashchar. Thank you for everything, prashchar," said Anatol. "Well, comrades, friends," — he pondered a moment, — "friends .... of my ... youth, prashchaite,” he said, turning to Makarin and the others.

Although they were all going with him, Anatol evidently wanted to do something affecting and solemn on the occasion of this farewell. He spoke in a low, slow, deep voice, and throwing out his chest, he swayed a little as he rested his weight on one leg. “All of you take your glasses! You too, Balaga. Well, comrades.... friends of my youth.... we have had jolly good times together. we have enjoyed life, we have been on many sprees, hey? Now, when shall we meet again? I am going abroad, farewell .... prashchat, my boys. To your health! Hurrah!”.... he cried, draining his glass and smashing it on the floor.

“To your good health!” exclaimed Balaga, also draining his glass and wiping his mouth with his handkerchief. Makarin, with tears in his eyes, embraced Anatol.

“Ekh! prince, how sad that we should have to part!” he exclaimed.

“Come, let us be off,” cried Anatol.

Balaga was on the point of leaving the room.

“Hold on there, wait,” said Anatol. “Shut the door. We must sit down first,—there, that’s the way.”

They closed the door and sat down, for the sake of the superstition.

“Well, now be off with you, boys,” said Anatol, getting up.

Anatol’s valet, Joseph, gave him his purse and saber, and all flocked into the anteroom.

“But where is the shuba?” demanded Dolokhof. “Hey, Ignatka, go to Matriona Matveyevna, and ask her for the shuba—the sable cloak. I have heard how girls go off on such occasions,” explained Dolokhof, with a wink. “She will come running out more dead than alive, dressed for staying in the house, and if you delay a moment too long there will be tears, and ‘O papasha!’ and ‘O mamasha!’ and she’ll be cold, and back she’ll go. So be sure you take this shuba with you, and have it all ready in the sledge.”
The valet brought a woman's cloak, lined with fox.

"You fool! I told you to get the sable. Hey, Matrioshka, bring the sable," he shouted, his voice ringing down through the rooms.

A handsome gipsy girl, though thin and pale, with brilliant black eyes, and curly, purplish black hair, with a red shawl over her shoulders, came hurrying out with the sable cloak over her arm.

"Why, I don't care; take it," said she, evidently afraid of her master, and yet regretting the cloak.

Dolokhov, without heeding her, took the fox-skin shuba, threw it over Matriosha, and wrapped it round her.

"So," said Dolokhov; "and so," he repeated, as he pulled the collar up above her head, leaving only a small opening for her face.

"That's the way, do you see?" and he moved Anatol's head towards the opening left by the collar, where Matriosha's brilliant smile could alone be seen.

"Well, good-by, Matriosha, prashchat," said Anatol, kissing her. "Ekh! my follies here are ended. Give my regards to Stioshka. Well, prashchat, Matrioshka. Wish me good luck."

"Well, then, prince, God grant you the best of luck," said Matriosha, in her gipsy accent.

At the doorstep two troikas were waiting with two jaunty yamschchiks in attendance. Balaga was on the box of the first sledge, and, with his elbows held high, was deliberately sorting the reins. Anatol and Dolokhov got in behind him; Makarin, Khvostikof, and the valet took their places in the other troika.

"All ready?" inquired Balaga. "Let her go!" he cried, twisting the reins round his wrists, and the three horses flew like the wind down the Nikitsky Boulevard.

"Tproo! podi! hey!.... tproo!" rang out Balaga's shout and that of the groom sitting on the box. On the Arbatskaya Square the troika ran into a carriage; there was a crash, a shout was heard, and the troika flew down over the Arbata. After dashing down the Podno vinsky, Balaga began to draw rein, and, pulling up, halted the horses at the crossing of Staraya Konyushennaya.

The groom leaped down to hold the horses' heads by the curb, while Anatol and Dolokhof strode along the sidewalk. Coming to the gate, Dolokhof gave a low whistle. The whistle was returned, and immediately after a chambermaid came running out.

"Come into the court, else you will be seen; she'll be down presently," said she.

Dolokhof remained by the gate. Anatol followed the chambermaid into the dvor, turned the corner, and ran up the steps.

Suddenly Gavrilo, Marya Dmitrievna's colossal footman, met Anatol.

"Be good enough to go to my mistress," said the footman, in a deep, bass voice, as he blocked all retreat from the door.

"Who's your mistress? Who are you?" demanded Anatol, in a breathless whisper.

"If you please, I was ordered to show you...."

"Kuragin! back!" cried Dolokhof. "You are betrayed! back!"

Dolokhof, who had been left at the outside gate, was engaged in a tussle with the dvornik, who was trying to shut it and prevent Anatol from returning through it. Dolokhof, with a final output of force, overturned the dvornik, seized Anatol by the arm, pulled him through the gate, and ran together with him back to their troika.

CHAPTER. XVIII

Marya Dmitrievna, finding the weeping Sonya in the corridor, had obliged her to confess the whole. Having got possession of Natasha's letter, and read it, Marya Dmitrievna took it and confronted Natasha with it.

"Wretched girl! shameless hussy!" said she to her.

"I will not listen to a single word!"
Pushing away Natasha, who looked at her with wondering but tearless eyes, she shut her in under lock and key; then she had ordered the dvornik to admit into the courtyard any who might come that evening, but not to let them out again, and she had ordered the footman to show such persons into her presence. Having made these arrangements, she took up her position in the drawing-room and waited for developments.

When Gavrilo came to inform Marya Dmitrievna that the abductors had escaped, she was very indignant; she got up, and for a long time paced up and down the room, with her hands clasped behind her back, deliberating on what she ought to do. At midnight, she got the key out from her pocket, and went to Natasha's room.

Sonya was still sitting in the corridor, sobbing. "Marya Dmitrievna, let me go to her, for God's sake," said she.

Marya Dmitrievna, giving her no reply, opened the door, and went in. "Disgusting! abominable! .... in my house! .... Indecent, shameless wench! .... Only I'm sorry for her father," said Marya Dmitrievna, trying to master her indignation. "Hard as it will be, I will bid them all hold their tongues, and I'll keep it from the count."

Marya Dmitrievna entered the chamber with a firm step. Natasha was lying on the sofa, with her face hidden in her hands; she did not stir, but lay in the same position in which Marya Dmitrievna had left her.

"Pretty conduct; pretty conduct, indeed!" exclaimed Marya Dmitrievna. "To make assignations with your lovers in my house! None of your hypocrisy! Listen when I speak to you!"

Marya Dmitrievna shook her by the arm.

"Listen when I speak to you! You have disgraced yourself, like any common wench! I'd settle this with you, but I have some pity for your father. I shall keep it from him."

Natasha did not change her position, but her whole body began to shake with the noiseless, convulsive sobs that choked her. Marya Dmitrievna glanced at Sonya, and sat down on the sofa near Natasha.

"Lucky for him he escaped me; but I 'll find him," said she, in her harsh voice. "Do you hear what I am saying?" She put her big hand under Natasha's face, and turned it toward her. Both Marya Dmitrievna and Sonya were amazed when they saw her face. Her eyes were dry and glittering, her lips compressed, her cheeks hollow.

"Let .... me .... be! .... What .... do .... I .... care? .... I .... shall die!" she murmured, turning away from Marya Dmitrievna with angry petulance, and hiding her face in her hands again.

"Natalya!" exclaimed Marya Dmitrievna, "I wish you well. Lie there .... lie there if you wish; I won't touch you; but listen to me! .... I am not going to show you how blameworthy you have been. You know. But, don't you see, your father will be back to-morrow; what shall I say to him?"

Again Natasha's form was shaken by sobs.

"He will hear of it; and so will your brother, and so will your betrothed!"

"I have no betrothed; I have broken with him!" cried Natasha.

"That 's immaterial," pursued Marya Dmitrievna. "Well, they will learn of it; do you think they will forgive it? There 's your father, I know him, — if he should challenge him, would it be a good thing? Ha?"

"Akh! leave me! why should you have interfered at all? Why? Why? Who asked you to?" screamed Natasha, sitting up straight on the sofa, and glaring angrily at Marya Dmitrievna.

"But what idea had you?" demanded Marya Dmitrievna, again losing her patience. "Were you kept locked up? Who on earth prevented him from coming to the house? Why must he needs carry you off like a gipsy wench? .... Well, now, suppose he had carried you off, do you suppose we should n't have found him? Either your father, or your brother, or your betrothed? Well, he's a scoundrel! a knave! that 's what he is!"...
"He's better than all of you put together," cried Natasha, sitting up very straight. "If you had not meddled!... Akh! my God, has it come to this, has it come to this? Sonya, what made you?....Go away!"

And she burst into a passion of tears, sobbing with the desperation such as only those feel who know that they are responsible for their own woes.

Marya Dmitrievna began to speak once more, but Natasha cried:

"Go away, go away! you all hate me! you all despise me!"

And she threw herself on the sofa again.

Marya Dmitrievna continued for some time to give her advice, and assure her that this whole affair ought to be kept a secret from the count; that no one would know anything about it, if only Natasha would try to let it all go, and not betray in any one's presence that anything had happened.

Natasha made no reply. She ceased to sob, but a fit of shivering and trembling came upon her. Marya Dmitrievna put a pillow under her head, covered her up with a couple of comforters, and herself brought her some linden flower; but Natasha had nothing to say to her.

"Now, let her go to sleep," said Marya Dmitrievna, and left the room, thinking that she would soon sleep.

But Natasha did not go to sleep, and with wide, staring eyes gazed into vacancy. She slept none that night, and she did not weep, and she did not speak to Sonya, who several times got up and went to her.

On the following day Count Ilya Andreyitch returned from his pod-Moskovnaya in time for breakfast, as he had promised. He was in a most genial frame of mind. He had come to a satisfactory arrangement with his purchaser, and now there was nothing to detain him in Moscow, and away from his countess, whom he was very anxious to see.

Marya Dmitrievna met him, and informed him that Natasha had been ill the day before, that they had sent for the doctor, and now she was better.
Natasha that morning did not leave her room. With set, cracked lips, with wide, dry eyes, she kept her place by the window, and anxiously gazed at the passers-by in the street, and turned anxiously toward those who entered her room. She was evidently expecting news from him,—expecting that either he would himself come, or send her a letter.

When the count went to her she heard the sound of his heavy steps, and turned round nervously, and then her face assumed its former expression of hauteur, and even anger. She did not get up to meet him.

"What is the matter with thee, my angel? Are you ill?" asked the count.

Natasha hesitated.

"Yes, I am ill," said she.

In reply to the count's anxious questions why she was so cast down, and whether anything had happened to her lover, she assured him that nothing had happened, and begged him not to be disturbed.

Marya Dmitrievna confirmed Natasha's statement that nothing had happened, but the count, judging from the imaginary illness, and by his daughter's absent-mindedness, by the troubled faces of Sonya and Marya Dmitrievna, saw clearly that during his absence something must have happened. It was so terrible, however, for him to think that anything disgraceful had happened to his beloved daughter, he was so happy in his buoyant good spirits, that he avoided asking any pointed questions, and tried hard to assure himself that nothing out of the way could have happened; and his only regret was that, on account of Natasha's indisposition, he was obliged to postpone their return to his country-seat.

CHAPTER XIX

Pierre, on the day of his wife's arrival at Moscow, had made up his mind to take a journey somewhere, so as to avoid being with her. Then, when the Rostofs came to Moscow, the impression produced upon him by Natasha made him hasten to carry out his intention. He went to Tver to see Iosiph Alekseyevitch's widow, who had some time since promised to put into his hands her husband's papers.

On Pierre's return to Moscow a letter was handed him from Marya Dmitrievna, who urged him to come and consult with her on some highly important business concerning Andrei Bolkonsky and his betrothed.

Pierre had avoided Natasha. It seemed to him that he felt for her a sentiment stronger than it was justifiable for a married man to harbor for his friend's mistress, and some perverse fate was constantly throwing them together.

"What can have happened? and what can it have to do with me?" he wondered, while dressing to go to Marya Dmitrievna's. "It's high time for Prince Andrei to be back and marry her," thought Pierre, as he set out for Mrs. Akhrasimova's.

On the Tversky Boulevard some one hailed him.

"Pierre, been back long?" cried a well-known voice.

Pierre raised his head. It was Anatol and his inseparable companion, Makarin, dashing by in a double sledge, drawn by two gray trotters, that sent the snow flinging over the dasher. Anatol sat bolt upright, in the classic pose of dashing warriors, with his neck muffled in a beaver collar, and bending his head a little. His face was fresh and ruddy; his hat, with a white plume, was set jauntily on one side, exposing his curled and pomaded hair, dusted with fine snow.

"Indeed, he's a real philosopher!" thought Pierre. "He sees nothing beyond the enjoyment of the present moment; nothing annoys him, and consequently he is always jolly, self-satisfied, and calm. What would I not give to be like him!" thought Pierre, with a feeling of envy.

In the anteroom of the Akhrasimova's, a footman, who relieved Pierre of his shuba, told him that Marya Dmitrievna would receive him in her own room.

As he opened the door into the music-room Pierre saw Natasha sitting by the window, with a pale, thin, angry face. She gave him a glance, and frowned, and, with an expression of chilling dignity, left the room.

"What has happened?" asked Pierre, on entering Marya Dmitrievna's room.

"Pretty state of affairs!" replied Marya Dmitrievna. "Fifty-eight years have I lived in this world, and I never saw anything so shameful."

And then, receiving Pierre's word of honor that he would keep secret what he should hear, Marya Dmitrievna confided to him that Natasha had broken her engagement with Prince Andrei without the knowledge of her parents; that the cause of this break was Anatol Kuragin, whom Pierre's wife had introduced to her, and with whom she had promised to elope during her father's absence, in order to enter into a clandestine marriage.

Pierre, with shoulders raised and mouth open, listened to Marya Dmitrievna's story, not believing his own ears. That Prince Andrei's betrothed, that hitherto lovely Natasha Rostova, so passionately beloved, should give up Bolkonsky for that fool of an Anatol, who was a married man,—for Pierre was in the secret of his marriage,—and be so enamoured of him as to consent to elope with him, Pierre could not comprehend and could not imagine.

Natasha's sweetness of character,—he had known her since childhood,—could not, in his mind, be associated with this new suggestion of baseness, folly, and cruelty in her. He remembered his own wife. "They are all alike," said he to himself, thinking that he was not the only one who had the misfortune to be in the toils of an unworthy woman; and at the same time he could have wept for his friend, Prince Andrei, to whose pride it would be such a grievous blow. And the more he grieved for his friend, the greater scorn, and even aversion, he felt for this Natasha, who had just passed by him, with such an expression of haughty dignity, in the music-room.

He did not know that Natasha's soul was full to overflowing of despair, shame, humiliation; and that she was not to blame for her face expressing, from very despair, that cold dignity and disdain.

"But how could he marry her?" exclaimed Pierre, catching at Marya Dmitrievna's last word. "He could not marry her; he already has a wife."

"Worse and worse!" exclaimed Marya Dmitrievna. "Fine young man!... What a dastard he is! And she has been waiting here these two days for him to come! At any rate, she must cease expecting him; we must tell her."

When she learned from Pierre all the details of Anatol's marriage, and had poured out the vials of her wrath against him in abusive words, Marya Dmitrievna explained to Pierre why she had asked him to call upon her. She was afraid that the count or Bolkonsky—who was liable to return at any moment—might learn of the affair, in spite of all her efforts to keep it a profound secret, and might challenge Kuragin to a duel; and, therefore, she besought him to add his influence to hers in getting him to leave town and never show himself in her presence again.

Pierre willingly agreed to fulfil her wishes, since now he for the first time realized the danger threatening the old count and Nikolai and Prince Andrei.

Having preferred her request in short and precise terms, she took him back into the drawing-room.

"Mind you! the count knows nothing of this. You must pretend that you also know nothing about it," said she. "And I am going this instant to tell her that she is to cease expecting him. And stay to dinner if you will," shouted back Marya Dmitrievna to Pierre.

Pierre met the old count. He was disturbed and annoyed. That morning Natasha had told him that she had broken her engagement with Bolkonsky.

"Too bad, too bad, mon cher," said he to Pierre. "Too bad for these girls to be away from their mother; how sorry I am that I ever came at all. I am going to be frank with you: she has already broken her engagement, without telling any one of us about it. Now I will admit I have never been over pleased at this engagement; I will agree he's a fine man, and all that; but what would you have? there would not be much happiness if the father was opposed; and Natasha would not lack chances of getting married. Still, the affair has gone on so long, and to have such a step taken without consulting father or mother! And now she's sick, and God knows what's the matter. It's a bad thing, count, a bad thing, for daughters to be without their mother!"

Pierre perceived that the count was very much disconcerted, and he tried to bring the conversation round to other topics; but the count kept returning to his grievance.

Sonya, with anxious face, came into the drawing-room.

"Natasha is not very well to-day; she is in her room, but she would like to see you. Marya Dmitrievna is with her, and would also like you to come."

"Yes, certainly, you and Bolkonsky were good friends; she probably wants to send some message," said the count. "Akh! my God! my God! How good it all was!" And, tearing at the locks of his gray hair, the count left the room.

Marya Dmitrievna had been explaining to Natasha that Anatol was married. Natasha refused to believe her, and insisted on having confirmation of it from Pierre himself. Sonya confided this to Pierre, as they passed along the corridor toward Natasha's room.

Natasha, pale and stern, was sitting next Marya Dmitrievna. The moment Pierre entered the doorway, she met him with feverishly glittering, wildly imploring eyes. She did not smile, she did not even greet him with a nod, she only looked at him eagerly, and her eyes merely demanded if he came as her friend, or, like all the rest, as her enemy, in reference to Anatol. Pierre, in his own personality as Pierre, evidently did not exist for her.

"He knows all about it," said Marya Dmitrievna, indicating Pierre, and addressing Natasha. "Let him tell you if I am not speaking the truth."
Natasha, as a wounded animal at bay glares at the dogs and huntsmen approaching, looked first at the one and then at the other.

"Natalya Ilyinitchna," Pierre began, dropping his eyes, and experiencing a feeling of compunction for her, and of aversion to the operation which he was obliged to perform, "it is true; but whether this is true or not true, as far as you are concerned, it cannot matter, because...."

"Then it is not true that he is married?"
"Nay, it is true."
"Has he been married for some time?" she asked.
"On your word of honor!"
Pierre gave her his solemn word of honor.
"Is he still in town?" she asked hurriedly.
"Yes; I have just seen him."
The effort to say more was evidently too much for her, and she made them a sign with her hand to leave her alone.

CHAPTER XX

Pierre did not remain for dinner, but immediately took his leave. He went out for the purpose of finding Anatol Kuragin, the mere thought of whom now made all the blood rush to his heart, and almost choked him. He sought him everywhere: at the ice-hills, among the gipsies, at Comoneno's; but he was nowhere to be found.

Pierre went to the club. There everything was going on in its usual train: the members, who were assembling for dinner, formed little groups, and, greeting Pierre, spoke of various items of city gossip. A servant, who knew his habits and his particular friends, accosted him politely, and informed him that a place was ready for him at the little table, that Prince N. N. was in the library, but that T. T. had not yet come.

One of Pierre's acquaintances, during some talk of the weather, asked him if he had heard of Kuragin's elopement with Rostova, about which the whole city were talking, and if it were true.

Pierre, with a laugh, said that it was all nonsense, because he had just come from the Rostofs'. He inquired of every one if they had seen Anatol; one said that he had not yet come, another that he would be there to dinner. It was strange for Pierre to look at this tranquil, indifferent throng of men, who had not the slightest inkling of what was passing in his mind. He then sauntered through the hall till all had gone in to dinner; and then, giving up expecting Anatol, he did not wait for dinner, but went home.

Anatol, whom he was so anxious to find, dined that day with Dolokhov, and was discussing with him some plan of still carrying out their ill-fated enterprise. It seemed to him absolutely necessary to have an interview with Natasha. In the evening he went to his sister's, in order to arrange with her some means of procuring this interview.

When Pierre, who had vainly ransacked all Moscow, returned home, the footman informed him that Prince Anatol Vasilyitch was with the countess. The countess's drawing-room was crowded with company.

Pierre, not even greeting his wife, whom he had not seen since his return (never had she seemed to him more utterly detestable than at that moment), went into the drawing-room, and, catching sight of Anatol, went straight up to him.

"Ah, Pierre!" cried the countess, approaching her husband. "You don't know in what a position our Anatol...." She paused when she saw, in the forward thrust of her husband's head, in his flashing eyes, and his resolute gait, the same strange, terrible expression of frenzy and might which she had known and experienced after his duel with Dolokhov.

"Sin and lewdness are with you everywhere," said Pierre to his wife. "Anatol, come with me, I want a few words with you," he said, in French.

Anatol glanced at his sister, and boldly rose, ready to follow Pierre.
Pierre took him by the arm and hurried him out of the room.

"If you permit yourself in my salon to...." exclaimed Ellen, in a whisper; but Pierre made her no reply, and left the room.

Anatol followed him with his usual jaunty gait, but there was a trace of anxiety on his face.

When they reached Pierre's cabinet, he shut the door, and addressed Anatol without looking at him.

"You promised to marry the Countess Rostova, and planned to elope with her?"

"My dear," replied Anatol, in French, in which language indeed the whole conversation was carried on, "I consider myself under no obligation to answer questions asked in such a tone."

Pierre's face, white to begin with, became perfectly distorted with rage. With his huge hand he seized Anatol by the collar of his uniform coat, and proceeded to shake him from side to side until the young man's face expressed a sufficient degree of terror.

"When I tell you that I must have an answer from you?"

"Now, look here, this is stupid! Ha?" exclaimed Anatol, looking for the button that had been torn off from his collar.

"You are a scoundrel and a blackguard, and I don't know what restrains me from the satisfaction of smashing your head with this," said Pierre, expressing himself with easy fluency because he spoke in French. He had taken into his hand a heavy paper-weight, and he held it up menacingly, and then slowly laid it back in its place again.

"Did you promise to marry her?"

"I.... I.... I don't think so; besides, I could n't have promised any such thing, be.... because...."

Pierre interrupted him.

"Have you any of her letters?" he demanded, coming close to him.

Anatol gave him one look, and instantly put his hand into his pocket, and took out a pocket-book.

Pierre seized the letter which he handed to him, and, violently pushing aside a chair that was in his way, he went to the sofa, and flung himself on it.

"I will not hurt you; have no fear," said he, in reply to Anatol's terrified gesture. "The letters.... one thing," said Pierre, as if he was repeating a lesson for his own edification. "Secondly," he continued, after a moment's silence, getting to his feet again, and beginning to pace up and down the room, "you must leave Moscow to-morrow."

"But how can I...."

"Thirdly," pursued Pierre, not heeding him, "you must never breathe a word about what has taken place between you and the countess. This, I know, I cannot oblige you to do, but if you have a single spark of conscience...."

Pierre walked in silence several times from one end of the room to the other. Anatol had sat down by the table, and was scowling and chewing his lips.

"You must learn sometime that above and beyond your own pleasure the happiness and peace of others are to be considered, that you are ruining a whole life for the sake of having a little amusement. Trifle with women like my wife as much as you please—with such you have fair game; they know what you want of them. They are armed against you by their very experience in lust; but to promise a young girl to marry her.... to deceive her.... to rob her.... why, don't you know that it is as cowardly as to strike an old man or a child?"

Pierre stopped speaking, and looked at Anatol inquiringly; his anger had vanished.

"I don't know, I'm sure; ha?" said Anatol, gaining confidence in proportion as Pierre's anger subsided. "I know nothing about it, and I don't want to know," said he, not looking at Pierre, while at the same time his lower jaw trembled slightly. "But you have spoken to me words so insulting that I as a man of honor cannot think of permitting them."

Pierre looked at him in amazement, perfectly unable to understand what was wanted of him.
"Though we have had no witnesses," continued Anatol, "still I cannot...."

"What! you wish satisfaction?" asked Pierre, scornfully.

"At least, you can retract what you said. Ha? That is, if you expect me to carry out your wishes. Ha?"

"I will! I'll take it back!" exclaimed Pierre. "And I beg you to forgive me." Pierre could not help looking at the torn button. "And money, if you need it for your journey."

Anatol smiled.

This contemptible, villainous smile, which he knew so well in his wife, stirred Pierre's indignation. "Oh! contemptible, heartless race!" he exclaimed, and left the room.

The next day Anatol started for Petersburg.

CHAPTER XXI

Pierre went to Marya Dmitrievna's to inform her how he had accomplished her wishes in regard to Anatol's expulsion from Moscow.

He found the whole house in terror and commotion. Natasha was very ill; and, as Marya Dmitrievna informed him, under seal of secrecy, the night after she had learned that Anatol Kuragin was married, she had poisoned herself with arsenic that she had managed surreptitiously to procure. Having swallowed a considerable quantity, she awakened Sonya and confessed what she had done. The proper antidotes to the poison had been given in time, and she was now out of danger, but she was still so weak that it was out of the question to think of taking her to the country, and the countess had been sent for. Pierre saw the troubled count and the weeping Sonya, but he was not allowed to see Natasha.

Pierre had that day dined at the club, and had heard on all sides gossip about the frustrated elopement; but he strenuously denied these rumors, assuring every one that there was nothing in it, except that his brother-in-law had offered himself to Rostova, and been refused. It seemed plain to Pierre that it was his bounden duty to conceal the whole affair, and save Natasha's reputation.

In the greatest anxiety he waited for Prince Andrei's return, and each day he went to the old prince's to inquire for news of him.

Prince Nikolai Andreyitch learned through Mlle. Bourienne of all this gossip flying through the city, and he read the letter to the Princess Mariya, in which Natasha broke off her engagement with Prince Andrei. He seemed in better spirits than usual, and with great impatience awaited his son's return.

A few days after Anatol's departure, Pierre received a note from Prince Andrei announcing his arrival, and begging Pierre to come to see him.

When Prince Andrei arrived at Petersburg, his father had immediately handed him Natasha's letter to his sister announcing the discontinuance of her engagement,—this letter Mlle. Bourienne had purloined from the princess and given to the old prince,—and had told him, with additions, the various rumors current concerning the elopement.

Prince Andrei's arrival had been in the evening. Pierre went to see him the next morning. He expected to find him in almost the same state of mind as Natasha was, and, therefore, his amazement was great, when, on being shown into the drawing-room, he heard Prince Andrei, in the adjoining cabinet, telling in a loud, animated manner of some Petersburg intrigue. He was occasionally interrupted by the old prince, and by a third person present.

The Princess Mariya came in to greet Pierre. She sighed as she turned her eyes toward the door of the room where her brother was, evidently anxious to give expression to her sympathy for his affliction, but Pierre detected on her face evidences of her inward gratification at the turn affairs had taken, and at the manner in which her brother had received the news of Natasha's fickleness.
"He told me that he expected this," said she. "I know that his pride would not let him make any show of his feelings, but nevertheless he bears up under it better, far better, than I had any reason to expect. Of course, since it had to be so...."

"But do you mean to say it is all over between them?"

The Princess Mariya looked at him in amazement. She could not understand how any one should even ask such a question.

Pierre went into the cabinet. Prince Andrei, much altered, and apparently restored to perfect health, but with a new and perpendicular wrinkle between his brows, was standing, in civil dress, in front of his father and Prince Meshchersky, and was arguing eagerly, making energetic gestures.

The topic was Speransky, news of whose unexpected banishment and reported treason had only just reached Moscow.

"Now," Prince Andrei was saying, "the very men who a month ago were extolling him, and who are wholly incapable of comprehending his aims, are criticizing him and condemning him. To criticize a man in disfavor is very easy, and so it is to make him responsible for the blunders of others; but I tell you, if any one has done any good during this present reign it has been done by him, by him alone."....

He caught sight of Pierre, and paused. His face contracted, and immediately took on an angry expression. "But posterity will do him justice," said he, and with that he turned to greet Pierre.

"Well, how are you? Still stout!" he said in a lively tone, but the newly furrowed frown on his brow grew still deeper. "Yes, I am well," he replied, in answer to Pierre’s question, and laughed. Pierre saw clearly that this laugh was affected, and was simply equivalent to saying, "I am well, but who cares whether I am well?"

After exchanging a few words with Pierre in regard to the frightful road from the Polish frontier, and how he met in Switzerland a number of men who had known Pierre, and about Mr. Dessalles, whom he had brought from abroad as his son's tutor, Prince Andreï again, with feverish eagerness, returned to the topic of Speransky, which the two old men were still discussing.

"If there had been any treason, and if there had been any proofs of his secret intercourse with Napoleon, then they would surely have been published broadcast," said he, speaking excitedly and fluently. "Personally I do not like Speransky, and I have not liked him, but I like justice."

Pierre was aware that his friend was now laboring under that necessity, which he himself had only too often experienced, of getting thoroughly stirred up and excited over some alien topic, simply for the purpose of dispelling thoughts too heavy to be endured.

When Prince Meshchersky had taken his departure, Prince Andreï took Pierre's arm, and drew him into the room which had been prepared for him. In this room a bed had been hastily set up; trunks and boxes, opened, were scattered about. Prince Andreï went to one of these and took out a casket, and from the casket a packet wrapped in a paper. All this he did silently and very swiftly. He straightened himself up and cleared his throat. His face was gloomy and his lips compressed.

"Forgive me if I trouble you...."

Pierre perceived that Prince Andreï was going to speak about Natasha, and his broad countenance expressed pity and sympathy. This expression on Pierre's face nettled Prince Andreï. He went on in a loud, decided, and disagreeable voice: —

"I have received my dismissal from the Countess Rostova; and rumors have reached my ears of your brother-in-law having offered himself to her, or something to that effect,—is that true?"

"Whether true or false...." Pierre began, but Prince Andreï interrupted him.

"Here are her letters and her miniature."
He took the packet from the table and handed them to Pierre.

"Give this to the countess.... if you happen to see her."

"She is very ill," said Pierre.

"So she is still here?" inquired Prince Andrei.

"And Prince Kuragin?" he asked hastily.

"He went away some time ago. She almost died...."

"I am very sorry for her illness," said Prince Andrei. He smiled coldly, evilly, disagreeably, like his father.

"But Mr. Kuragin did not, then, honor the Countess Rostova with the offer of his hand?" asked Prince Andrei. He snorted several times.

"It is impossible for him to marry, for the reason that he is already married," said Pierre.

Prince Andrei gave a disagreeable laugh, again suggestive of his father.

"And where, pray, is your brother-in-law now to be found — may I ask?" said he.

"He has gone to Peters.... However, I don't really know," said Pierre.

"Well, it's all the same to me," said Prince Andrei.

"Assure the Countess Rostova that she has been, and is, perfectly free, and that I wish her all happiness."

Pierre took the package of letters. Prince Andrei, as if trying to make up his mind whether it were not necessary for him to say something, or expecting Pierre to say something, looked at him keenly.

"See here, do you remember a discussion we once had in Petersburg? Do you remember...."

"Yes, I remember," said Prince Andrei, hurriedly.

"I said that a fallen woman ought to be forgiven; but I did not say that in my own case I could forgive her. I cannot."

"But wherein is the comparison?".... asked Pierre.

Prince Andrei interrupted him. His voice was loud and sharp:

"Yes, ask her hand again? Be magnanimous, and all that?.... yes, that would be very noble, but I am not capable of following in this gentleman's footsteps. — If you wish to continue my friend, never mention this to me again.... not a word about it. Now, good-by. You will give that to her?"....

Pierre left the room, and went to the old prince and the Princess Mariya.

The old prince seemed more animated than usual. The Princess Mariya was her ordinary self, but, back of her sympathy for her brother, Pierre could see that she was delighted at having the engagement broken. As Pierre looked at them, he realized how deep were the scorn and dislike which they all felt for the Rostofs; he realized that it was wholly hopeless even to mention her name, though she might have had any one else in the world in Prince Andrei's place.

At dinner the conversation turned on the war which was unquestionably imminent. Prince Andrei kept up an unceasing stream of talk and discussion with his father, or with Mr. Dessalles, his son's Swiss tutor, and he displayed more excitement than usual; and Pierre knew only too well the moral cause of this excitement.

CHAPTER XXII

That same evening Pierre went to call on the Rostofs, to fulfil his commission.

Natasha was in bed, the count had gone to the club, and Pierre, having intrusted the letters into Sonya's hands, went to Marya Dmitrievna, who was greatly interested to know how Prince Andrei had received the news.

Ten minutes later, Sonya appeared.

"Natasha is determined to see Count Piotr Kirillovitch," said she.

"But how can he go to her room? Everything is in disorder there," said Marya Dmitrievna.

"But she is dressed, and has come down into the drawing-room," said Sonya.

Marya Dmitrievna merely shrugged her shoulders.
"If only the countess would come; this is a perfect torture to me. Now be careful, and don't tell her everything, Pierre," she added warily. "It would break my heart if anything were said to hurt her; she is so to be pitied, so to be pitied!"

Natasha, grown decidedly thin, and with pale, set face—though not at all confused, as Pierre supposed she would be—stood in the middle of the drawing-room. When Pierre made his appearance in the door, she hesitated, evidently undecided whether to go to him or to wait for him.

Pierre hastened forward. He supposed that she would, as usual, give him her hand. But she stood motionless, sighing deeply, and with her arms hanging lifelessly, in exactly the same pose that she always took when she went into the middle of the music-room to sing, only with an entirely different expression.

"Piotr Kiriluitich," she began, speaking very rapidly, "Prince Bolkonsky was your friend, and is still your friend," she added, by an afterthought; for it seemed to her that everything was past, and all things had changed. "He told me once to turn to you if...."

Pierre quietly blew his nose as he looked at her. Till that moment he had, in his heart, blamed her, and tried to despise her; but now she seemed to him so eminently deserving of pity, that there was no room in his heart for reproach.

"He is here now; please ask him to for.... forgive...."

She paused, and breathed still faster, but she did not weep.

"Yes.... I will tell him," said Pierre, "but...."

He knew not what to say.

Natasha was evidently terrified by what Pierre might have thought she meant.

"Yes, I know that all is over between us," said she, hurriedly. "No, it can never be. All that tortures me is the wrong that I have done him. Only ask him to forgive, forgive, forgive me for all...."

Her whole frame trembled, and she sat down in a chair.
Never before had Pierre experienced such a feeling of compassion as now came over him.

"I will tell him, I will certainly tell him all,".... said Pierre. "But .... I should like to know one thing.".... "What?" asked Natasha.

"I should like to ask if you loved...." Pierre did not know what term to use in speaking of Anatol, and reddened at the thought of him. "Did you love that vile man?"

"Don't call him vile," exclaimed Natasha. "But I .... I don't know; I don't know at all."....

Then the tears came again.

And a still more intense feeling of pity, affectionate compassion, and love came over Pierre. He heard the tears welling out from under his spectacles and dropping, and he hoped that they would not be noticed.

"Let us say no more about it, my dear," said Pierre.

Strange indeed suddenly seemed to Natasha the sound of his voice, so sweet, so tender, so sincere.

"Let us say no more about it, my dear, I will tell him all; but one thing I want to ask you: consider me your friend, and if you need any help or advice, or simply if you need some one in whom you can confide—not now, but by and by, when everything is clear to your own mind, remember me." He took her hand and kissed it. "I shall be happy, if I am in the position to...."

Pierre grew confused.

"Do not speak to me so, I cannot bear it!" cried Natasha, and she started to leave the room; but Pierre detained her by the hand. He knew that there was something more he must tell her. But when he had spoken it, he was amazed at his own words.

"Wait, wait! all the future is yours," said he.

"Mine! Only ruin is for me!" she exclaimed, in shame and self-reproach.

"Ruin!" he repeated; "if I were not myself, but the handsomest, wisest, and best man in the world, and were free, I would this very instant, on my knees, sue for your hand and your love."

Natasha, for the first time in many days, wept tears of gratitude and emotion; and, giving Pierre one look, she fled from the room.

Pierre immediately afterwards almost ran out into the anteroom, and, restraining the tears of tenderness and happiness that choked him, he threw his shuba over his shoulders, but without putting his arms through the sleeves, and got into his sledge.

"Where now?" asked the driver.

"Where?" repeated Pierre to himself. "Where can I go now? To the club, or to make some calls?"

All men, at this moment, seemed to him so contemptible, so mean, in comparison with that feeling of emotion and love which overmastered him—in comparison with that softened glance of gratitude which she had given him just now through her tears.

"Home," said Pierre, throwing back his bearskin shuba, over his broad, joyfully throbbing chest, though the mercury marked ten degrees of frost.

It was cold and clear. Above the dirty, half-lighted streets, above the black roofs of the houses, stretched the dark, starry heavens. {Only as Pierre gazed at the heavens above, he ceased to feel the humiliating pettiness of everything earthly in comparison with the height to which his soul aspiréd. As he drove out on the Arbatskaya Square, the mighty expanse of the dark, starry sky spread out before Pierre's eyes. Almost in the zenith of this sky, — above the Pretchistensky Boulevard, — convoyed and surrounded on every side by stars, but distinguished from all the rest by its nearness to the earth, and by its white light, and by its long, curling tail, stood the tremendous brilliant comet of 1812, — the very comet which men thought presaged all manner of woes and the end of the world.

But in Pierre, this brilliant luminary, with its long train of light, awoke no terror. On the contrary, rapturously, his eyes wet with tears, he contemplated this glorious star which seemed to him to have come flying with inconceivable swiftness through measureless space, straight toward the earth, there to strike like an enormous arrow, and remain in that one fate-designated spot upon the dark sky; and, pausing, raise aloft with monstrous force its curling tail, flashing and playing with white light, amid the countless other twinkling stars. It seemed to Pierre that this star was the complete reply to all that was in his soul as it blossomed into new life, filled with tenderness and love.

END OF VOL. III.
CONTENTS

PART IX

CHAPTER I. PAGE 1

CHAPTER II. P. 7

CHAPTER III. P. 12

CHAPTER IV. P. 17

Balashof's mission to Napoleon. Cavalier treatment. Interview with Murat. Taken to Davoust.

CHAPTER V. P. 22

CHAPTER VI. P. 24

CHAPTER VII. P. 33

Balashof dines with Napoleon. Balashof's repartees. Napoleon pulls his ear.

CHAPTER VIII. P. 37

CHAPTER IX. P. 45

Prince Andreî at the camp on the Drissa. Chilling reception by Barclay de Tolly. Prince Andreî studies the situation. The three armies. The commanders. The essential idea. Theories. The eight great parties Yermolof's famous jest. The ninth party. Shishkof urges the emperor to leave the army.

CHAPTER X. P. 54

Prince Andreî invited to meet the emperor. The council. Pfuhl as a type of the German martinet. Types of self-confidence, French, English, Italian, German, and Russian.

CHAPTER XI. P. 58

CHAPTER XII. P. 65

CHAPTER XIII. P. 70

At the tavern. Getting dry. Marie Heinrichovna does the honors. Gallantry of the officers. The regimental doctor's jealousy. Jolly times.
CONTENTS

CHAPTER XIV. P. 74

CHAPTER XV. P. 78

Rostof's gallant charge upon the French dragoons. Capture of the young officer. Reaction. Nikolai's promotion. Thoughts suggested.

CHAPTER XVI. P. 82

CHAPTER XVII. P. 86

CHAPTER XVIII. P. 91 (July, 1812)

CHAPTER XIX. P. 97

CHAPTER XX. P. 101

CHAPTER XXI. P. 109

Arrival of the Tsar. Petya's experiences at the Kreml. Crushed. Service at the Uspiensky (Assumption) Cathedral. The dinner at the palace. Petya gets the biscuit. And is allowed to enter the army.
CHAPTER XXII. P. 116

CHAPTER XXIII. P. 123

PART X

CHAPTER I. PAGE 126

CHAPTER II. P. 133

CHAPTER III. P. 138

The prince's instructions to Alpatuitch. The prince retires. A vision of the past. Potemkin.

CHAPTER IV. P. 142

1 This peculiarity of Prince Bolkonsky is evidently imitated from Napoleon at St. Helena; see Bourrienne's "Memoirs."
CONTENTS

CHAPTER V. P. 155

CHAPTER VI. P. 163

CHAPTER VII. P. 169

Was Napoleon lured on to Moscow? Thiers’s opinion. Napoleon’s order. Moscou! Napoleon’s conversation with Lavrushka. Thiers’s version of the interview.

CHAPTER VIII. P. 173

CHAPTER IX. P. 184

CHAPTER X. P. 190

CHAPTER XI. P. 197

The gathering of the peasants. Princess Mariya’s speech. The representative of her family. Misunderstanding.
CONTENTS

CHAPTER XII. P. 200

CHAPTER XIII. P. 203

CHAPTER XIV. P. 208

CHAPTER XV. P. 214

CHAPTER XVI. P. 222

CHAPTER XVII. P. 226

CHAPTER XVIII. P. 232

CHAPTER XIX. P. 238

CHAPTER XX. P. 245

CHAPTER XXI. P. 250

CHAPTER XXII. P. 255

CHAPTER XXIII. P. 260

Riding round the lines. The Kurgannaya battery. Bagration's fleches. The hare. Benigsen changes one of Kutuzof's dispositions.

CHAPTER XXIV. P. 263

CHAPTER XXV. P. 266

CONTENTS

CHAPTER XXVI. P. 276

CHAPTER XXVII. P. 281

The day before Borodino. Napoleon's actions. His dispositions. The famous plan. Criticism of the plan. Why the various details failed to be carried out.

CHAPTER XXVIII. P. 285

Napoleon's influenza. Effect on the battle. Was a negligent valet the savior of Russia? Fatalism in history. Napoleon as the representative of power. A fictitious commander.

CHAPTER XXIX. P. 288

Napoleon before the battle. "The chessmen are set." His coolness. "Fortune is a fickle jade." Definition of "our bodies." "The art of war." The signal guns.

CHAPTER XXX. P. 292

Pierre views the battle-field from the hill. Magnificence of the panorama. The firing.

CHAPTER XXXI. P. 296

CHAPTER XXXII. P. 305

The struggle in the battery. Yermolof's charge.

CHAPTER XXXIII. P. 307

Chief action of Borodino. Napoleon's enforced ignorance. Impossibility of directing such a battle. The domain of death.
CHAPTER XXXIV. P. 312

CHAPTER XXXV. P. 318

CHAPTER XXXVI. P. 323

Prince Andrei with the reserve under fire. Incidents. The cinnamon-colored puppy. The bunch of wormwood. The bursting shell. Prince Andrei wounded. Carried to the field lazaret.

CHAPTER XXXVII. P. 329

CHAPTER XXXVIII. P. 333

Napoleon's sang-froid. Consents to a massing of artillery. Napoleon's St. Helena judgment of the Russian war.

CHAPTER XXXIX. P. 337

After the battle. The message of the rain. Reasons for quiescence. Would the battle have been won had Napoleon used his Old Guard? Exhaustion of the French morale. What is victory? The wounded beast of prey. Consequence of the battle.
TOWARD the end of the year 1811 began a mobilization and concentration of forces in Western Europe; and in 1812, these forces—millions of men, counting those who were concerned in the transport and victualing of the armies—were moved from West to East toward the borders of Russia, where the Russian forces were drawn up just as they had been the year before.

On the twenty-fourth of June, the forces of Western Europe crossed the Russian frontier, and war began: in other words, an event took place opposed to human reason and human nature.

Millions of men committed against one another a countless number of crimes, deceptions, treacheries, robberies, forgeries, issues of false assignats, depredations, incendiary fires, murders, such as the annals of all the courts in all the world could not equal in the aggregate of centuries; and yet which, at that period, the perpetrators did not even regard as crimes.

What brought about this extraordinary event?
What were its causes?

The historians, with naïve credulity, say that the causes of this event are to be found in the affront offered to the Duke of Oldenburg, in the disregard of the "Continental System," in Napoleon's ambition, Alexander's firmness, the mistakes of diplomatists, and what not.
Of course, in that case, to put a stop to the war, it would have merely required Metternich, Rumyantsof, or Talleyrand, between a levee and a rout, to have made a little effort and skilfully composed a state paper; or Napoleon to have written to Alexander: Monsieur, mon Frère, je consens à rendre le duché au Duc d'Oldenbourg.

It is easily understood that the matter presented itself in that light to the men of that day. It is easily understood that Napoleon attributed the cause of the war to England's intrigues (indeed he said so on the island of St. Helena); it is easily understood that the members of the British Parliament attributed the cause of the war to Napoleon's ambition; that Prince Oldenburg considered the war to have been caused by the insult which he had received; that the merchants regarded the "Continental System," which was ruining European trade, as responsible for it; that old veterans and generals saw the chief cause for it in the necessity to find them something to do; the legitimists of that day, in the necessity of upholding sound principles; and the diplomatists in the fact that the Russian alliance with Austria, in 1809, had not been cleverly enough kept from Napoleon's knowledge and that memorandum No. 178 was awkwardly expressed.

It is easily understood that these, and an endless number of other reasons—the diversity of which is simply proportioned to the infinite diversity of standpoints—satisfied the men who were living at that time; but for us, Posterity, who are far enough removed to contemplate the magnitude of the event from a wider perspective, and who seek to fathom its simple and terrible meaning, such reasons appear insufficient. To us it is incomprehensible that millions of Christian men killed and tortured each other because Napoleon was ambitious, Alexander firm, English policy astute, and Duke Oldenburg affronted. It is impossible to comprehend what connection these circumstances have with the fact itself of murder and violence: why, in consequence of the affront put on the duke, thousands of men from the other end of Europe should have killed and plundered the people of the governments of Smolensk and Moscow, and have been killed by them.

For us, Posterity, who are not historians, and not carried away by any far-fetched processes of reasoning, and who can, therefore, contemplate the phenomena with unclouded and healthy vision, the causes thereof arise before us in all their innumerable quantity. The deeper we delve into the investigation of causes, the more numerous do they open up before us; and every separately considered cause, or whole series of causes, appears equally efficient in its own nature, and equally fallacious by reason of its utter insignificance in comparison with the prodigiousness of the events; and equally fallacious also by reason of its inability, without the coöperation of all the other causes combined, to produce the events in question.

Such a cause as the refusal of the Napoleon to draw his army back within the Vistula, and to restore the duchy of Oldenburg, has as much weight in this consideration as the willingness or unwillingness of a single French corporal to take part in the second campaign; because, if he had refused, and a second, and a third, and a thousand corporals and soldiers had likewise refused, Napoleon’s army would have been so greatly reduced that the war could not have occurred.

If Napoleon had not been offended by the demand to retire his troops beyond the Vistula, and had not issued orders for them to give battle, there would have been no war; but if all the sergeants had refused to go into action, there also would have been no war. And there would also have been no war if there had been no English intrigues, and no Prince Oldenburg; and if Alexander had not felt himself aggrieved; and if there had been no autocratic power in Russia; and if there had been no French Revolution, and no Dictatorship and Empire following it; and nothing of all that led up to the Revolution, and so on. Had any one of these causes been missing, war could not have taken place. Consequently, all of them—milliards of causes—must have coöperated to bring about what resulted.
And, as a corollary, there could have been no exclusive final cause for these events; and the great event was accomplished simply because it had to be accomplished. Millions of men, renouncing all their human feelings, and their reason, had to march from West to East, and kill their fellows; exactly the same as, several centuries before, swarms of men had swept from East to West, likewise killing their fellows.

The deeds of Napoleon and Alexander, on whose fiat apparently depended this or that occurrence, were just as far from being spontaneous and free as the actions of any soldier taking part in the expedition, either as a conscript or as a recruit. This was inevitably the case, because, in order that Napoleon’s or Alexander’s will should be executed— they being apparently the men on whom the event depended—the cooperation of countless factors was requisite, one of which failing, the event could not have occurred. It was indispensable that millions of men, in whose hands was really all the power, soldiers who fought, and men who transported munitions of war and cannon, should consent to carry out the will of these two feeble human units; and they were brought to this by an endless number of complicated and varied causes.

Fatalism in history is unavoidable, if we would explain its preposterous phenomena (that is to say, those events the reason for which is beyond our comprehension). The more we strive by our reason to explain these phenomena in history, the more illogical and incomprehensible to us they become.

Every man lives for himself, and enjoys sufficient freedom for the attainment of his own personal ends, and is conscious in his whole being that he can instantly perform or refuse to perform any action; but as soon as he has done it, this action, accomplished in a definite period of time, becomes irrevocable and forms an element in history, in which it takes its place with a fully preordained and no longer capricious significance.

Every man has a twofold life: on one side is his personal life, which is free in proportion as its interests are abstract; the other is life as an element, as one bee in the swarm; and here a man has no chance of disregar-ding the laws imposed on him.

Man consciously lives for himself; but, at the same time, he serves as an unconscious instrument for the accomplishment of historical and social ends. An action once accomplished is fixed; and when a man's activity coincides with others, with the millions of actions of other men, it acquires historical significance. The higher a man stands on the social ladder, the more men he is connected with, the greater the influence he exerts over others,—the more evident is the predestined and unavoidable necessity of his every action.

"The king's heart is in the hand of the Lord."
The king is the slave of history.

History, that is to say,* the unconscious, universal life of humanity, in the aggregate, every moment profits by the life of kings for itself, as an instrument for the accomplishment of its own ends.

Napoleon, notwithstanding the fact that never before had it seemed so evident to him as now in this year 1812, that it depended on him whether he should shed or not shed the blood of his people,—*verser le sang de ses pe-ples, as Alexander expressed it in his last letter to him, —was in reality never before so subordinated to the inevitable laws that compelled him—even while, as it seemed to him, working in accordance with his own free will,—to accomplish for the world in general, for history, what was destined to be accomplished.

The men of the West moved toward the East so as to kill one another. And, by the law of coincidences, thousands of trifling causes made themselves into the guisé of final causes, and, coinciding with this event, apparently explained this movement and this war: the dissatisfaction at the non-observance of the "Continental System"; and the Duke of Oldenburg; and the invasion of Prussia, undertaken (as it seemed to Napoleon) simply for the purpose of bringing about an armed peace; and the French emperor's love and habit of war coinciding with the disposition of his people; the attraction of grander preparations, and the outlays for such preparations, and the necessity for indemnities for meeting these outlays; and the intoxicating honors paid at Dresden; and the diplomatic negotiations which, in the opinion of contemporaries, were conducted with a sincere desire to preserve peace, but which merely offended the pride of either side; and millions of millions of other causes, serving as specious reasons for this event which had to take place, and coinciding with it.

When an apple is ripe and falls, what makes it fall? Is it the attraction of gravitation? or is it because its stem withers? or because the sun dries it up? or because it is heavy? or because the wind shakes it? or because the small boy standing underneath is hungry for it? There is no such proximate cause. The whole thing is the result of all those conditions, in accordance with which every vital, organic, complex event occurs. And the botanist who argues that the apple fell from the effect of decomposing vegetable tissue, or the like, is just as much in the right as the boy who, standing below, declares that the apple fell because he wanted to eat it, and prayed for it.

Equally right and equally wrong would be the one who should say that Napoleon went to Moscow because he wanted to go, and was ruined because Alexander wished him to be ruined; equally right and equally wrong would be the man who should declare that a mountain, weighing millions of tons and undermined, fell in consequence of the last blow of the mattock dealt by the last laborer. In the events of history, so-called great men are merely tags that supply a name to the event, and have quite as little connection with the event itself as the tag.

Every one of their actions, though apparently performed by their own free will, is, in its historical significance, out of the scope of volition, and is correlated with the whole trend of history; and is, consequently, preordained from all eternity.
CHAPTER II

On the tenth of June, Napoleon started from Dresden, where he had been for three weeks the center of a court composed of princes, dukes, kings, and at least one emperor.

Before his departure, Napoleon showed his favor to the princes, kings, and the emperor, who deserved it; he turned a cold shoulder on the kings and princes who had incurred his displeasure; he gave the empress of Austria pearls and diamonds, which he called his own, though they had been stolen from other kings, and then tenderly embracing the Empress Maria Louisa, as the historian terms her, left her heartbroken by his absence, which it seemed to her, now that she considered herself his consort, although he had another consort left behind in Paris, was too hard to be endured.

Although the diplomats stoutly maintained their belief in the possibility of peace, and were working heartily for this end; although Napoleon himself wrote a letter to the Emperor Alexander, calling him Monsieur mon Frère, and sincerely assuring him that he had no desire for war, and that he should always love and respect him,—still, he was off for the army, and at every station was issuing new rescripts having in view to expedite the movement of the troops from West to East.

He traveled in a calash drawn by six horses, and accompanied by his pages, aides, and an escort, and took the route through Posen, Thorn, Dantzig, and Königsberg. The army was moving from the West to the East, and relays of fresh horses bore him in the same direction. On the twenty-second of June, he overtook the army, and spent the night in the Wilkowiski forest, on the estate of a Polish count, where quarters had been made ready for him.

On the following day Napoleon, outstripping the army, drove to the Niemen in his calash; and, for the purpose of reconnoitering the spot where the army was to cross, he put on a Polish uniform, and went down to the banks of the river.

When he saw on the other side the Cossacks, and the wide-stretching steppes, in the center of which was Moscou, la ville sainte, the capital of that empire which reminded him of the Scythian one, against which Alexander of Macedon had marched, Napoleon, unexpectedly and contrary to all strategical as well as diplomatic considerations, gave orders for the advance, and on the next day the troops began to cross the Niemen.

Early on the morning of the twenty-fourth he emerged from his tent, which had been pitched on the steep left bank of the river, and looked through his field-glass at the torrents of his troops pouring forth from the Wilkowiski forest, and streaming across the three bridges thrown over the Niemen.

The troops were aware of the presence of the emperor; they searched for him with their eyes, and when they discovered him on the cliff, standing in front of his tent, and distinguished from his suite by his figure, in an overcoat and cocked hat, they flung their caps in the air, and shouted, "Vive l'empereur!" and then, rank after rank, a never-ceasing stream, they poured forth and still poured forth from the mighty forest that till now had concealed them, and, dividing into three currents, crossed over the bridges to the other side.

"Something'll be done this time! Oh, when he takes a hand, he makes things hot! .... God .... save us. .... There he is! .... Hurrah for the emperor!"

"So these are the steppes of Asia? Beastly country all the same!"

"Good-by! Beauché, I'll save the best palace in Moscow for you. Good-by! Luck to you!" ....

"Have you seen him? The emperor? — Hurrah for the emperor — ror — ror!"

"If I am made governor of India, Gérard, I'll appoint you minister at Cashmir; that's a settled thing."

"Hurrah for the emperor! Hurrah! hurrah! hurrah!"

"Those rascally Cossacks! how they run! Hurrah for the emperor!"
"There he is! Do you see him? Twice I've seen him as plain as I see you.... the 'Little Corporal!'"

"I saw him give the cross to one of our vets.... Hurrah for the emperor!"

Such were the remarks and shouts made by men, both young and old, of the most widely differing characters and positions in the world. The faces of all these men bore one universal expression of delight at the beginning of the long-expected campaign, and of enthusiasm and devotion for the man in the gray overcoat, standing on the hill.

On the twenty-fifth of June a small thoroughbred Arab steed was brought to Napoleon, and he mounted and set off at a gallop down to one of the bridges over the Niemen, greeted all the way by enthusiastic acclamations, which he evidently endured for the reason that it was impossible to prevent the men from expressing by these shouts their love for him; but these acclamations, which accompanied him wherever he went, fatigued him, and distracted his attention from the military task that met him at the moment he reached the army.

He rode across the bridge, which shook under his horse's hoofs, and, on reaching the farther side, turned abruptly to the left, and galloped off in the direction of Kovno, preceded by his mounted guards, who, crazy with delight and enthusiasm, cleared the way for him through the troops pressing on ahead. On reaching the broad river Vistula, he reined in his horse near a regiment of Polish Uhlans, which was halted on the bank.

"Hurrah!" shouted the Polyaks, no less enthusiastically, as they fell out of line, elbowing one another, in their efforts to get a sight of him. Napoleon contemplated the river; then dismounted and sat down on a log which happened to be lying on the bank. At a mute signal, his telescope was handed him; he rested it on the shoulder of one of his pages, who came forward beaming with delight, and began to reconnoiter the other shore. Then he remained lost in study of a map spread out over the driftwood. Without lifting his head he said something, and two of his aides galloped off toward the Polish Uhlans.

“What was it? What did he say?” was heard in the ranks of the Uhlans, as one of the aides came hurrying toward them.

The order was that they should find a ford, and cross to the other side.

The Polish colonel who commanded the Uhlans, a handsome old man, flushing, and stumbling in his speech from excitement, asked the aide-de-camp whether he might be permitted to swim the river with his men, instead of trying to find the ford. He was evidently as apprehensive of receiving a refusal as a school-boy who asks permission to ride on horseback; and what he craved was the chance to swim the river under his emperor’s eyes.

The aide-de-camp replied that in all probability the emperor would not be displeased with this superfluity of zeal.

As soon as the aide-de-camp had said this, the old mustached officer, with beaming face and gleaming eyes, waved his sword and cried Vivat! And, ordering his Uhlans to follow him, he plunged spurs into his horse and dashed down to the river. He angrily struck the horse, which shied under him, and forced him into the water, striking out boldly into the swift current where it was deepest. The water was cold, and the swiftness of the current made the passage difficult. Hundreds of Uhlans galloped after him. The Uhlans clung to one another, in case they were dismounted from their horses. Several of the horses were drowned, and some of the men; the others endeavored to swim, one clinging to his saddle, another to his horse’s mane. Their endeavor was to swim to the farther side, and, although there was a ford only half a verst below, they were proud of swimming and drowning in that river under the eye of a man who sat on the log and did not even notice what they were doing!

When the aide-de-camp on his return found a favorable moment, and allowed himself to call the emperor’s attention to the devotion of these Polyaks to his person, the little man in the gray surtout got up, and, calling Berthier, began to walk with him back and forth on the river bank, giving him orders, and occasionally casting a dissatisfied glance at the drowning Uhlans, who distracted his attention.

It was nothing new in his experience that his presence in any corner of the world, in the deserts of Africa as well as in the Moscovite steppes, was sufficient to stimulate and drive men into senseless self-sacrifice. He commanded a horse to be brought, and rode back to his bivouac.

Forty Uhlans were drowned in the river, although boats were sent to their aid. The majority gave up the task, and returned to the hither side. The colonel and a few of the men swam across the river, and with great difficulty crept up on the farther shore. But as soon as they were on the land, though their garments were streaming with water, they shouted Vivat, gazing with enthusiasm at the spot where Napoleon had been, but from which he had vanished, and counting themselves fortunate.

In the afternoon, after making arrangements for procuring with all possible despatch the counterfeit Russian assignats, which had been prepared for use in Russia; and after issuing an order to shoot a certain Saxon, who, in a letter that had been intercepted, gave information in regard to the disposition of the French army,—Napoleon, in still a third order, caused the Polish colonel who had quite needlessly flung himself into the river, to be enrolled in the Légion d’Honneur,\(^1\) of which he himself was the head.

\textit{Quos vult perdere — dementat.}\(^2\)

\(^1\) Instituted by Napoleon, May 19, 1802; carried out, July 14, 1814.

\(^2\) Those whom God wishes to destroy, he first makes mad.
CHAPTER III

The Russian emperor, meantime, had been now for more than a month at Vilna, superintending reviews and manoeuvres.

Nothing was ready for the war, though all had foreseen that it was coming, and though the emperor had left Petersburg to prepare for it. The vacillation as to what plan, from among the many that had been prepared, was to be selected, was still more pronounced after the emperor had been for a month at headquarters.

Each of the three divisions of the army had a separate commander; but there was no nachalnik, or responsible chief, over all the forces; and the emperor did not see fit to assume this position.

The longer the emperor stayed at Vilna, the less ready for the war were they who had grown weary of expecting it. The whole purpose of those who surrounded the sovereign seemed directed toward making him pass the time agreeably and forget about the impending conflict.

After a series of balls and festivities, given by Polish magnates, and by the courtiers, and by the emperor himself, one of the Polish general-adjutants proposed in June that the imperial staff should give a banquet and ball, in his majesty’s honor.

The suggestion was gladly adopted by all. The sovereign granted his sanction. The imperial aides collected the necessary funds by a subscription. A lady, who it was thought would be most acceptable to the emperor, was invited to do the honors. Count Benigsen, a landed proprietor of the Vilna government, tendered the use of his country-house for the festivity, which was set for the twenty-fifth of June; and it was decided that the ball and banquet, together with a regatta and fireworks, should take place at Zakreto, Count Benigsen’s country-place.

On that very day on which orders were given by Napoleon to cross the Niemen, and the vanguard of his army drove back the Cossacks and crossed the Russian frontier, Alexander was spending the evening at Count Benigsen's villa, at a ball given by his staff!

It was a gay, brilliant occasion. Connoisseurs in such matters declared that seldom had so many pretty women been gathered in one place. The Countess Bezukhaya, who, with other Russian ladies, had followed the sovereign from Petersburg to Vilna, was at this ball, by her heavy so-called Russian beauty quite putting into the shade the more refined and delicate Polish ladies. She attracted much attention, and the sovereign condescended to dance with her.

Boris Drubetskoï, having left his wife at Moscow, was also present at this ball _en garçon_, as he expressed it; and, although not a general-adjutant, was a participant in the festivities in virtue of having subscribed a large sum toward the expenses. Boris was now a rich man, who had already arrived at high honors and now no longer required patronage, but stood on an equal footing with those of his own age, no matter how lofty their rank might be.

He met Ellen at Vilna, not having seen her for some time; but he made no reference to the past. But as Ellen was "enjoying the favor" of a very influential individual, and Boris had not been long married, they met as good old friends.

At midnight they were still dancing. Ellen, finding no partner to her taste, had herself proposed to Boris that they should dance the mazurka together. They were in the third set. Boris, with cool indifference glancing at Ellen's dazzling, bare shoulders, set off by a dark-gauze dress, shot with gold, was talking about old acquaintances; and, at the same time, neither she nor any one else observed that, not for a single second, did he cease to watch the emperor, who was in the same hall.

The emperor was not dancing; he was standing in the doorway, and addressing, now to one and now to another, those gracious words which he, of all men alone, had the art of speaking.

Just before the beginning of the mazurka, Boris noticed that the General-Adjutant Balashof, who stood on terms of special intimacy with the sovereign, approached him as he was talking with a Polish lady, and, contrary to court etiquette, stood waiting at a short distance from him. While still talking, the sovereign looked up inquiringly, and, evidently perceiving that only weighty considerations would have caused Balashof to act thus, he gave the lady a slight bow, and turned to Balashof.

At Balashof's very first words, an expression like amazement came over the sovereign's face. He took Balashof's arm, and, together with him, crossed the ball-room, so absorbed that he did not notice how the company parted, making a sort of lane, three sazhens wide, through which he passed.

Boris observed Arakcheeyef's agitated face, as the sovereign walked out with Balashof. Arakcheeyef, looking askance at the emperor, and snuffing through his red nose, moved out from the throng, evidently expecting that the sovereign would address him. It was clear to Boris that Arakcheeyef hated Balashof, and was much dissatisfied that any news of importance should be brought to the sovereign otherwise than through him.

But the sovereign, not heeding Arakcheeyef, passed out, together with Balashof, through the open door, into the brilliantly illuminated garden. Arakcheeyef, grasping the hilt of his sword, and viciously glancing around, followed them, twenty steps in the rear.

While Boris continued to perform the proper figures of the mazurka, he was continually tortured by the thought of what news Balashof had brought, and how he might get hold of it before the others.

In the figure, when he had to choose a lady, he whispered to Ellen that he wanted to get the Countess Potocka, who, he believed, had gone out on the balcony. Hastily crossing the marquetry floor, he slipped out of the open door into the garden; and there, perceiving the sovereign walking along the terrace in company with Balashof, he stepped to one side. The sovereign and Balashof were directing their steps toward the door.
Boris, pretending that in spite of all his efforts he had not time to get out of the way, respectfully crowded up against the lintel and bowed.

The sovereign, with the agitated face of a man personally offended, uttered these words:—

"To make war against Russia without any declaration! I will never consent to peace so long as a single armed foe remains in my land!" said he. It seemed to Boris that the sovereign took a delight in uttering these words; he was satisfied with the form in which his thought was couched, but he was annoyed that Boris had overheard him. "Let not a word of this be known," he added, with a frown. Boris understood that this was a hint to him, and, closing his eyes, he again bowed slightly. The sovereign returned to the ball-room, and remained for about half an hour longer.

Boris was the first to learn the news of the French army having crossed the Niemen; and, turning his luck to good use, made several important personages think that many things concealed from the others were known to him, and thereby he succeeded in rising still higher in their estimation.

The news of the French crossing the Niemen, unexpected as it was, was peculiarly unexpected after a long month of strained expectancy, and by reason of being announced at a ball! The sovereign, at the first instant of receiving the news, under the influence of inner revolt and indignation, made use of that bold sentiment which gave him such satisfaction, and so exactly expressed his feeling, at the time, and afterwards became famous.

On his return to his residence after the ball, the sovereign sent, at two o'clock in the morning, for his secretary, Shishkof, and dictated a general order to his troops, and a rescript to Field-Marshal Prince Saltuikof, strictly charging him to use the words about his refusal to make peace so long as a single armed Frenchman remained on Russian soil. On the next day, the following note was written to Napoleon:—
My Brother: — I learned yesterday that, notwithstanding the fidelity with which I have adhered to my engagements toward your majesty, your troops have crossed the Russian frontier; and I have this moment received from Petersburg a note wherein Count Lauriston, in order to explain this aggression, announces that your majesty considered himself at war with me from the time that Prince Kurakin demanded his passports. The grounds on which the Duke of Bassano refused to grant it would never have allowed me to suppose that this step could serve as a pretext for the aggression. In fact, my ambassador was never authorized to take this step, as he himself explicitly declared; and, as soon as I was informed of it, I manifested the extent of my disapproval by ordering him to remain at his post. If your majesty is not obstinately bent upon shedding the blood of our peoples through a misunderstanding of this sort, and will consent to withdraw your troops from the Russian territory, I will regard what has passed as non-existent, and we may arrive at some accommodation. In the opposite case, your majesty, I shall be compelled to repulse an attack which I have done nothing to provoke. There is still a chance for your majesty to avoid the calamities of a new war.

I am, etc.,

(Signed) Alexander.

1 Monsieur mon frère: — J'apris hier que malgré la loyauté, avec laquelle j'ai maintenu mes engagements envers votre majesté, ses troupes ont franchi les frontières de la Russie, et je reçois à l'instant de Petersbourg une note par laquelle le Comte Lauriston, pour cause de cette aggression, annonce que votre majesté s'est considérée comme en état de guerre avec moi dès le moment où le prince Kourakine a fait la demande de ses passeports. Les motifs sur lesquelles le duc de Bassano fondait son refus de les lui délivrer, n'auraient jamais pu me faire supposer que cette démarche servirait jamais de prétexte à l'agression. En effet cet ambassadeur n'y a jamais été autorisé comme il l'a déclaré lui-même, et aussitôt que j'en fus informé, je lui ai fait connaître combien je le désapprouvais en lui donnant l'ordre de rester à son poste. Si votre majesté n'est pas intentionnée de verser le sang de nos peuples pour un malentendu de ce genre et qu'elle consent a retirer ses troupes du territoire russe, je regarderai ce qui s'est passé comme non avenu et un accommodement entre nous sera possible. Dans le cas contraire, votre majesté, je me verrai forcé de repousser une attaque que rien n'a provoquée de ma part. Il dépend encore de votre majesté, d'éviter à l'humanité les calamités d'une nouvelle guerre.

Je suis, etc.,

(Signé) Alexandre.
CHAPTER IV

On the twenty-fifth of June, at two o'clock in the morning, the sovereign, having summoned Balashof and read over to him his letter to Napoleon, ordered him to take it and deliver it to the French emperor in person. In despatching Balashof, the sovereign once more repeated what he had said about not making peace so long as a single armed foe remained on Russian soil, and he ordered him to quote these exact words to Napoleon. The sovereign did not incorporate this threat in his letter to Napoleon, because his tact made him feel that they were inappropriate at a moment when the last efforts were making for reconciliation; but he strenuously commanded Balashof to repeat them to Napoleon verbally.

Setting off that very same night, Balashof, accompanied by a bugler and two Cossacks, by daybreak reached the village of Rykonty, on the Russian side of the Niemen, where the French vanguard were stationed. He was brought to a halt by the French videttes. A non-commissioned officer of hussars, in a crimson uniform and shaggy cap, challenged the approaching envoy, and ordered him to halt. Balashof did not come instantly to a pause, but continued to advance at a footpace along the road.

The subaltern, scowling and muttering some abusive epithet, blocked Balashof's way with his horse, and rudely shouted to the Russian general, demanding if he were deaf, that he paid no attention to what was said to him. Balashof gave his name. The subaltern sent a soldier to the officer in command.

Paying no further heed to Balashof, the non-commissioned officer began to talk with his comrades concerning their private affairs, and did not even look at the Russian general.

It was an absolutely new experience for Balashof, after being so accustomed to proximity to the very fountainhead of power and might, after just coming from a three hours' conversation with his sovereign, and having been universally treated with respect, to find, here on Russian soil, this hostile and peculiarly disrespectful display of brutal insolence.

The sun was just beginning to break through the clouds; the air was cool and fresh with dew. Along the road from the village they were driving the cattle to pasture. Over the fields, one after another, like bubbles in the water, soared the larks with their matin songs.

Balashof looked about him while waiting for the officer to arrive from the village. The Russian Cossacks and the bugler and the French hussars occasionally exchanged glances, but no one spoke.

A French colonel of hussars, evidently just out of bed, came riding up from the village on a handsome, well-fed, gray horse, accompanied by two hussars. The officer, the soldiers, and their horses had an appearance of content and jauntiness.

It was the first period of the campaign, while the army was still in the very best order, almost fit for a review in time of peace, with just a shade of martial smartness in their attire, and with their minds a trifle stirred up to that gayety and cheerfulness and spirit of enterprise which always characterize the beginning of an expedition.

The French colonel with difficulty overcame a fit of yawning, but he was courteous, and evidently appreciated Balashof's high dignity. He conducted him past his soldiers inside the lines, and informed him that his desire to have a personal interview with the emperor would in all probability be immediately granted, since the imperial headquarters, he believed, were not far distant.

They approached the village of Rykonty, riding past pickets, sentinels, and soldiery, who saluted their colonel, and gazed with curiosity at the Russian uniforms, and finally came to the other side of the village. According to the colonel, the chief of division, who would receive Balashof and arrange the interview, would be found two kilometers distant.
The sun had now risen, and was shining gayly over the vivid green of the fields.

They had just passed a pot-house on a hillside, when they saw, coming to meet them up the hill, a little band of horsemen, in front of whom rode a tall man in a red cloak and in a plumed hat, under which long dark locks rolled down over his shoulders. He bestrode a coal-black horse, whose housings glittered in the sun, and his long legs were thrust forward in the fashion affected by French riders. This man came at a gallop toward Balashof, flashing and waving in the bright June sun, with his plumes and precious stones and gold galloons.

Balashof was within the length of two horses from this enthusiastically theatrical-looking individual, who was galloping to meet him in all his bravery of bracelets, plumes, necklaces, and gold, when Iulner, the French colonel, respectfully said, in a deferential whisper, "The king of Naples."

This was indeed Murat, who was still called the king of Naples. Although it was wholly incomprehensible in what respect he was the king of Naples, still he bore that title; and he himself was convinced of its validity, and consequently he assumed a more majestic and important aspect than ever before. He was so convinced that he was actually king of Naples, that when, on the day before his departure from that city, as he was walking with his wife through the streets of Naples, and a few Italians acclaimed him with "Viva il re,—Hurrah for the king,—he turned to his consort and said, with a melancholy smile:

"Oh, poor creatures, they do not know that I am going to leave them to-morrow."

But, though he firmly believed that he was king of Naples, and was grieved for the sorrow that was coming upon his faithful subjects in losing him, still when he was commanded to enter the military service again, and especially since his meeting with Napoleon at Dantzic, when his august brother-in-law had said to him, "I made you king to reign in my way, not in yours," he had cheerfully taken up the business which he understood so well, and, like a carriage-horse, driven but not over-worked, feeling himself in harness, he was frisky even between the thills, and, decked out in the most gorgeous and costly manner possible, galloped gayly and contentedly along the Polish highway, not knowing whither or wherefore.

1Je vous ai fait roi pour régner à ma manière, mais pas à la vôtre.

As soon as he approached the Russian general, he threw his head back in royal fashion, and solemnly, with his black curls flowing down over his shoulders, looked inquiringly at the French colonel. The colonel respectfully explained to his majesty Balashof's errand, though he could not pronounce his name.

"De Bal-ma-cheve," said the king, his self-confidence helping him to overcome the difficulty that had floored the colonel. "Charmed to make your acquaintance, general," he added, with a royally gracious gesture.

The moment the king began to speak loud and rapidly all the kingly dignity instantly deserted him, and, without his suspecting such a thing himself, changed into a tone of good-natured familiarity. He laid his hand on the withers of Balashof's horse.

"Well, general, everything looks like war, it seems," said he, as if he regretted a state of things concerning which he was in no position to judge.

"Sire," replied Balashof, "the emperor, my sovereign, has no desire for war, and, as your majesty sees," .... said Balashof, and thus he went on, with unavoidable affectation, repeating the title votre majesté at every opportunity during his conversation with this individual, for whom this title was still a novelty.

Murat's face glowed with dull satisfaction while he listened to Monsieur de Balachoff. But royauté oblige; and he felt that it was indispensable for him, as king and ally, to converse with Alexander's envoy; on matters of state. He dismounted, and, taking Balashof's arm, and drawing him a few paces aside from his suite, waiting respectfully, he began to walk up and down with him, trying to speak with all authority. He informed him that the Emperor Napoleon was offended by the demand made upon him to withdraw his forces from Prussia; especially as this demand was made publicly, and, therefore, was an insult to the dignity of France.

Balashof said that there was nothing insulting in this demand, "Because...."

Murat interrupted him....

"So then you do not consider the Emperor Alexander as the instigator of the war?" he asked suddenly, with a good-naturedly stupid smile.

Balashof explained why he really supposed that Napoleon was the aggressor.

"Ah, my dear general," again exclaimed Murat, interrupting him, "I desire, with all my heart, that the emperors should come to a mutual understanding, and that the war, begun in spite of me, should be brought to a termination as soon as possible," said he, in the tone of servants who wish to remain good friends, though their masters may quarrel. And he proceeded to make inquiries about the grand duke, and the state of his health, and recalled the jolly good times which they had enjoyed together at Naples. Then, suddenly, as if remembering his kingly dignity, Murat drew himself up haughtily, struck the same attitude in which he had stood during his coronation, and, waving his right hand, said:

"I will not detain you longer, general; I wish you all success in your mission;" and then, with his embroidered red mantle and plumes waving, and his precious trinkets glittering in the sun, he rejoined his suite, which had been respectfully waiting for him.

Balashof went on his way, expecting, from what Murat said, to be very speedily presented to Napoleon himself. But, instead of any such speedy meeting with Napoleon, the sentinels of Davoust's infantry corps detained him again at the next village—just as he had been halted at the outposts—until an aide of the corps commander, who was sent for, conducted him to Marshal Davoust, in the village.
Davoust was the Emperor Napoleon's Arakcheyef — Arakcheyef except in cowardice: just the same, punctilious and cruel, and knowing no other way of manifesting his devotion than by cruelty.

In the mechanism of imperial organism, such men are necessary, just as wolves are necessary in the organism of nature; and they always exist and manifest themselves and maintain themselves, however incompatible their presence and proximity to the chief power may seem. Only by this indispensableness can it be explained how Arakcheyef — a cruel man, who personally pulled the mustaches of grenadiers, and who by reason of weakness of nerves could not endure any danger, and was ill-bred and ungentlemanly — could maintain power and influence with a character so chivalrous, noble, and affectionate as Alexander's.

In the barn attached to a peasant's cottage, Balashof found Marshal Davoust, sitting on a keg, and busily engaged in clerk's business (he was verifying accounts). An aide stood near him. He might have found better accommodations; but Marshal Davoust was one of those men who purposely make the conditions of life as disagreeable as possible for themselves, in order to have an excuse for being themselves disagreeable. Consequently, they are always hurried and obstinate. 'How can I think of the happy side of life when, as you see, I am sitting on a keg, in a dirty barn, and working?' the expression of his face seemed to say. The chief satisfaction and requirement of such men are that they should be brought into contact with men of another stamp, and to make before them an enormous display of disagreeable and obstinate activity. This gratification was granted Davoust when Balashof was ushered into his presence. He buried himself more deeply than ever in his work when the Russian general appeared. He glanced over his spectacles at Balashof's face, which was still glowing under the impression of the beautiful morning and the meeting with Murat, but he did not get up or even stir. He put on a still more portentous frown, and smiled sardonically.

Noticing the impression produced on Balashof by this reception, Davoust raised his head, and chillingly demanded what he wanted.

Supposing that this insulting reception was given him because Davoust did not know that he was the Emperor Alexander's general-adjutant, and, what was more, his envoy to Napoleon, Balashof hastened to inform him of his name and mission. Contrary to his expectation, Davoust, after listening to Balashof's communication, became still more gruff and rude.

"Where is your packet?" he demanded. "Give it to me; I will send it to the emperor."

Balashof replied that he was ordered to give the package personally to the emperor.

"Your emperor's orders are carried out in your army; but here," said Davoust, "you must do as you are told."

And, as if to make the Russian general feel still more keenly how completely he was at the mercy of brute force, Davoust sent an aide for the officer of the day.

Balashof took out the packet containing the sovereign's note, and laid it on the table—a table improvised of a door, with the torn hinges still protruding, and laid on a couple of barrels. Davoust took the packet and read the superscription.

"You have a perfect right to treat me with respect, or not to treat me with respect," said Balashof. "But permit me to remark that I have the honor of being one of his majesty's aides."....

Davoust gazed at him without saying a word; but a trace of annoyance and confusion, betrayed in Balashof's face, evidently afforded him gratification.

"All due respect will be showed you," said he; and, placing the envelop in his pocket, he left the barn.

A moment later, the marshal's aide, Monsieur de Castrier, made his appearance, and conducted Balashof to the lodgings made ready for him; Balashof dined that same day with the marshal, in the barn, the boards on the barrels serving as the table; early in the morning of the following day, Davoust came, and taking Balashof to one side, told him confidentially that he was requested to stay where he was; though if the baggage train received orders to advance, he was to advance with it, and not to communicate with any one except with Monsieur de Castrier.

At the end of four days of solitude, of tediousness of his helplessness and insignificance all the more palpable after the environment of power to which he had so recently been accustomed, after a number of transfers with the marshal's baggage and the French forces which occupied the whole region, Balashof was brought back to Vilna, now in possession of the French; he reentered the town by the same gate by which he had left it four days before.

On the following day the imperial chamberlain, Monsieur de Turenne, came to Balashof and announced that the Emperor Napoleon would be pleased to grant him an audience.

Four days previously sentinels from the Preobrazhensky regiment had been standing in front of the mansion into which Balashof was conducted; now two French grenadiers in blue uniforms opened over the chest, and in shaggy caps, an escort of hussars and Uhlan and a brilliant suite of aides, pages, and generals, were standing at the steps near his saddle-horse and his Mameluke Rustan, waiting for him to make his appearance.

Napoleon received Balashof in the same house in Vilna from which Alexander had despatched him.

CHAPTER VI

Though Balashof was accustomed to court magnificence, the sumptuousness and display of Napoleon's court surprised him. Count Turenne conducted him into the great drawing-room, where a throng of generals, chamberlains, and Polish magnates, many of whom Balashof had seen at court during the sojourn of the Russian emperor, were in waiting. Duroc told the Russian general that the Emperor Napoleon would receive him before going out to ride.

At the end of some moments of expectation the chamberlain on duty came into the great drawing-room, and, bowing courteously, invited Balashof to follow him.

Balashof passed into a small reception-room which opened into the cabinet,—into the very same cabinet where the Russian emperor had given him his directions. Balashof stood two minutes waiting. Then quick steps were heard in the other room. The folding doors were hastily flung open. All was silent, and then firm, resolute steps were heard coming from the cabinet: it was Napoleon. He had only just completed his toilet for riding on horseback. He was in a blue uniform coat thrown open over a white waistcoat which covered the rotundity of his abdomen; he wore white chamois-skin small-clothes that fitted tightly over the stout thighs of his short legs, and Hessian boots. His short hair had evidently only just been brushed, but one lock of hair hung down over the center of his broad brow. His white, puffy neck was in sharp contrast with the dark collar of his uniform coat; he exhaled a strong odor of eau-de-Cologne. On his plump and youthful-looking face with its prominent chin was an expression of gracious, imperially majestic condescension.

He came in, giving little quick jerks as he walked along, and holding his head rather high. His whole figure, thick-set and short, with his broad, stout shoulders and with the abdomen and breast involuntarily thrust forward, had that portly, stately carriage which men of forty who have lived in comfort are apt to have. Moreover it was evident that on this particular day he was in the serenest frame of mind.

He inclined his head in response to Balashof's low and respectful bow, and, approaching him, began immediately to speak like a man who values every moment of his time, and does not condescend to make set speeches, but is convinced in his own mind that he always speaks well and to the point.
"How are you, general?" said he. "I have received the Emperor Alexander's letter which you brought, and I am very glad to see you."

He scrutinized Balashof's face with his large eyes, and then immediately looked past him. It was evident that Balashof's personality did not interest him in the least. It was evident that only what came into his own mind had any interest for him. Everything outside of him had no consequence, because, as it seemed to him, everything in the world depended on his will alone.

"War I do not desire, and I have not desired it," said he. "But I have been driven to it. Even now" — he laid a strong stress on the word — "I am ready to accept any explanation which you can offer."

And he began clearly and explicitly to state the grounds for his dissatisfaction with the Russian government. Judging by the calm, moderate, and even friendly tone in which the French emperor spoke, Balashof was firmly convinced that he was anxious for peace and intended to enter into negotiations.

"Sire, l'Empereur, mon maître...."

Balashof began his long-prepared speech when Napoleon, having finished what he had to say, looked inquiringly at the Russian envoy; but the look in the emperor's eyes, fastened on him, confused him. 'You are confused, — regain your self-possession,' Napoleon seemed to say as he glanced with a hardly perceptible smile at Balashof's uniform and sword. Balashof recovered his self-possession and began to speak. He declared that the Emperor Alexander did not consider Kurakin's demand for his passport a sufficient ground for war, that Kurakin had proceeded on his own responsibility and without the sovereign's sanction, that the Emperor Alexander did not wish for war, and that he had no understanding with England.

"None as yet," suggested Napoleon, and, as if fearing to express his thought, he scowled and slightly inclined his head, giving Balashof to understand that he might go on.

Having said all that he had been empowered to say, Balashof declared that the Emperor Alexander desired peace, but that he would not enter into negotiations except on condition that — here Balashof stopped short. He recollected the words which the Emperor Alexander had not incorporated in the letter, but which he had strenuously insisted should be inserted in the rescript to Saltuikof, and which he had commanded Balashof to repeat to Napoleon. Balashof remembered these words, "so long as an armed foe remains on Russian soil," but some complicated feeling restrained him. He found it impossible to repeat these words, in spite of his desire to do so. He hesitated, and said, "On condition that the French troops retire beyond the Niemen."

Napoleon remarked Balashof's confusion as he said those last words. His face twitched; the calf of his left leg began to tremble nervously. Not stirring from the place where he was standing, he began to speak in a higher key, and more rapidly than before. All the time that he was speaking, Balashof, not once shifting his eyes, involuntarily watched the twitching of Napoleon's left calf, which increased in violence in proportion as he raised his voice.

"I desire peace no less than the Emperor Alexander," said he. "Have I not for eighteen months done everything to preserve it? I have been waiting eighteen months for an explanation. But what is demanded of me before negotiations can begin?" he asked, with a frown, and emphasizing his question with an energetic gesture of his little, white, plump hand.

"The withdrawal of the troops beyond the Niemen, sire," replied Balashof.

"Beyond the Niemen," repeated Napoleon. "So that is all that is wanted now, is it, — 'beyond the Niemen,' merely beyond the Niemen," insisted Napoleon, looking straight at Balashof.

Balashof respectfully inclined his head.

"Four months ago the demand was to evacuate Pomerania, but now all that is required is to retire beyond the Niemen." — Napoleon abruptly turned away and began to pace up and down the room. "You say that it is demanded of me to retire beyond the Niemen before there can be any attempt at negotiations; but in exactly the same way two months ago all that was required of me was to retire beyond the Oder and the Vistula, and yet you can still think of negotiating?"

He walked in silence from one corner of the room to the other, and then stopped in front of Balashof. Balashof noticed that his left leg trembled even faster than before, and his face seemed petrified in its sternness of expression. This trembling of his left calf Napoleon himself was aware of. He afterwards said, "La vibration de mon mollet gauche est un grand signe chez moi."

"Any propositions to abandon the Oder or the Vistula may be made to the Prince of Baden, but not to me," Napoleon almost screamed, the words seeming to take him by surprise. "If you were to give me Petersburg and Moscow, I would not accept such conditions. You have said that I began this war. But who went to his army first? The Emperor Alexander, and not I. And you propose negotiations when I have spent millions, when you have made an alliance with England, and when your position is critical—you propose negotiations with me! But what is the object of your alliance with England? What has she given you?" he asked hurriedly, evidently now making no effort to show the advantages of concluding peace, and deciding on the possibilities of it, but only to prove his own probity and power, and Alexander’s lack of probity and blundering statecraft.

The beginning of his remarks evidently went to show what an advantageous position he held, and to prove that, nevertheless, he would be willing to have negotiations opened again. But he was now fairly launched in his declaration, and the longer he spoke the less able he was to control the current of his discourse. The whole aim of his words now seemed to exalt himself and to humiliate Alexander, which was precisely what he least of all wished to do at the beginning of the interview.

"It is said you have concluded peace with the Turks?"

Balashof bent his head affirmatively. "Peace has been dec....” he began; but Napoleon gave him no chance to speak. It was plain that he wished to have the floor to himself, and he went on talking with that eloquence and excess of irritability to which men who have been spoiled are so prone.

“Yes, I know that you have concluded peace with the Turks, and without securing Moldavia and Valakhia. But I would have given your sovereign these provinces, just as I gave him Finland! Yes,” he went on to say, “I promised the Emperor Alexander the provinces of Moldavia and Valakhia, and I would have given them to him; but now he shall not have those beautiful provinces. He might, however, have united them to his empire, and, in his reign alone, he would have made Russia spread from the Gulf of Bothnia to the mouths of the Danube. Catherine the Great could not have done more,” exclaimed Napoleon, growing more and more excited, as he strode up and down the room, and saying to Balashof almost the same words which he had said to Alexander himself at Tilsit. “All that my friendship would have brought to him! Oh, what a glorious reign! what a glorious reign!” he repeated several times. He paused and took out a gold snuff-box, and greedily sniffed at it. “What a glorious reign the Emperor Alexander’s might have been!”

He gave Balashof a compassionate look, but as soon as the general started to make some remark, Napoleon hastened to interrupt him again.

“What could he have wished or sought for that he would not have secured by being my friend?”.... Napoleon asked, shrugging his shoulders in perplexity. “No; he preferred to surround himself with my enemies, and what enemies!” pursued Napoleon. “He has attached to himself Steins, Armfeldts, Benigsens, Winzengerodes! Stein, a traitor banished from his own country; Armfeldt, a scoundrel and intriguer; Winzengerode, a fugitive French subject; Benigsen, a rather better soldier than the others, but still incapable, who had no idea how to act in 1807, and who ought to arouse horrible recollections in the emperor’s mind.... We will grant that he might make some use of them, if they had any capacity," pursued Napoleon, scarcely able in his speech to keep up with the arguments that kept rising in his mind in support of his right or might—the two things being one in his view. "But there is nothing of the sort: they are of no use either for war or peace! Barclay, they say, is better than all the rest of them; but I should not say so, judging by his first movements. But what are they doing? What are all these courtiers doing? Pfuhl proposes; Armfeldt argues; Benigsen considers; and Barclay, when called upon to act, knows not what plan of action to decide on, and time slips away, and nothing is accomplished. Bagration alone is a soldier. He is stupid, but he has experience, a quick eye, and decision. And what sort of a part is your young sovereign playing in this hopeless throng? They are compromising him, and making him responsible for everything that takes place. A sovereign has no right to be with his army unless he is a general," said he, evidently intending these words to be taken as a direct challenge to the Russian emperor. Napoleon was well aware how desirous the Emperor Alexander was to be a military commander.

"The campaign has not been begun a week, and you could not defend Vilna. You are cut in two, and driven out of the Polish provinces. Your army is already grumbling."

"On the contrary, your majesty," said Balashof, scarcely remembering what had been said to him, and finding it hard to follow this pyrotechnic of words, "the troops are full of zeal...."

"I know all about it," said Napoleon, interrupting him. "I know the whole story; and I know the contingent of your battalions as well as that of my own. You have not two hundred thousand men; and I have three times as many. I give you my word of honor," said Napoleon, who forgot that his word of honor might have very little weight,—"I give you my word of honor that I have five hundred and thirty thousand men on this side of the Vistula. The Turks will be no help to you; they are never of any use; and they have proved this by making peace with you. The Swedes—it is their fate to be ruled by madmen. Their king was crazy: they got rid of him, and chose another—Berna-dotte, who instantly lost his wits; because it is sure proof of madness if a Swede enters into alliance with Russia.”

Napoleon uttered this with a vicious sneer, and again carried the snuff-box to his nose.

To each of Napoleon’s propositions, Balashof was ready and willing to give an answer; he kept making the gestures of a man who has somewhat to say; but Napoleon gave him no chance to speak. In refutation of the Swedes’ being mad, Balashof was anxious to state that Sweden was isolated if Russia were against her; but Napoleon angrily shouted so as to drown his words. Napoleon had worked himself up into that state of irritation in which a man must talk, and talk, and talk, if for nothing else but to convince himself that he is in the right of a question.

Balashof began to grow uncomfortable: as an envoy he began to fear that he was compromising his dignity, and he felt it incumbent on him to reply; but, as a man, he had a moral shrinking before such an unreasonable passion as Napoleon had evidently worked himself into. He knew that anything Napoleon might say in such circumstances had no significance; that he himself, when he came to think it over, would be ashamed. Balashof stood with eyes cast down, looking at Napoleon’s restless stout legs, and tried to avoid meeting his eyes.

“But what do I care for your allies?” demanded Napoleon. “I too have allies—these Poles, eighty thousand of them; they fight like lions, and there will be two hundred thousand of them.”

And, probably, still more excited by the fact that in making this statement he was uttering a palpable falsehood, and by Balashof standing there, in silent submission to his fate, he abruptly turned back, came close to Balashof, and, making rapid and energetic gestures with his white hands, he almost screamed:—
"Understand! If you incite Prussia against me, I assure you, I will wipe her off from the map of Europe," said he, his face pale and distorted with rage, and energetically striking one white hand against the other. "Yes, and I will drive you beyond the Dvina and the Dnieper; and I will again set up against you that barrier which Europe was stupid and blind enough to permit to be overthrown. That is what will become of you, that is what you will have lost in alienating me," said he, and once more paced the room in silence a number of times, jerking his stout shoulders.

He replaced his snuff-box in his waistcoat pocket, took it out again, carried it to his nose several times, and halted directly in front of Balashof. He stood thus without speaking, and gazed directly into Balashof's eyes, with a satirical expression; then he said, in a low tone:—

"Et cependant quel beau regne aurait pu avoir votre maître — what a glorious reign your master might have had!"

Balashof, feeling it absolutely indispensable to make some answer, declared that affairs did not present themselves to the eyes of the Russians in such a gloomy aspect. Napoleon said nothing, but continued to look at him with the same satirical expression, and apparently had not heard what he said. Balashof declared that in Russia the highest hopes were entertained of the issue of the war. Napoleon tossed his head condescendingly, as much as to say, 'I know it is your duty to say so, but you do not believe it; my arguments have convinced you.'

When Balashof had finished what he had to say, Napoleon once more raised his snuff-box, took a sniff from it, and then stamped twice on the floor, as a signal. The door was flung open; a chamberlain, respectfully approaching, handed the emperor his hat and gloves; another brought him his handkerchief. Napoleon, not even looking at them, addressed Balashof:—

"Assure the Emperor Alexander, in my name," said he, as he took his hat, "that I esteem him as warmly as before; I know him thoroughly, and I highly appreciate his lofty qualities. Je ne vous retiens plus, général; vous recevrez ma lettre à l'empereur.

And Napoleon swiftly disappeared through the door. All in the reception-room hurried forward and down the stairs.

CHAPTER VII

After all that Napoleon had said to him, after those explosions of wrath, and after those last words spoken so coldly, "I will not detain you longer, general, you will receive my letter to the emperor," Balashof was convinced that Napoleon would not only have no further desire to see him, but would rather avoid seeing him, a humiliated envoy, and, what was more, a witness of his undignified heat. But, to his amazement, he received through Duroc an invitation to dine that day with the emperor.

The guests were Bessières, Caulaincourt, and Berthier.

Napoleon met Balashof with a cheerful face and affably. There was not the slightest sign of awkwardness or self-reproach for his outburst of the morning, but, on the contrary, he tried to put Balashof at his ease. It was plain to see that Napoleon was perfectly persuaded that there was no possibility of his making any mistakes, and that in his understanding of things all that he did was well, not because it was brought into comparison with the standards of right and wrong, but simply because he did it.

The emperor was in excellent spirits after his ride through Vilna, where he was received and followed by the acclamations of a throng of people. In all the windows along the streets where he passed were displayed tapestries, flags, and decorations ornamented with his monogram, while Polish ladies saluted him and waved their handkerchiefs.

At dinner he had Balashof seated next himself, and treated him, not only cordially, but even as if he considtered him one of his own courtiers, one of those who sympathized in his plans and rejoiced in his successes. Among other topics of conversation he brought up Moscow, and began to ask Balashof about the Russian capital, not merely as an inquisitive traveler asks about a new place which he has in mind to visit, but as if he was convinced that Balashof, as a Russian, must be flattered by his curiosity.

"How many inhabitants are there in Moscow? How many houses? Is it a fact that Moscow is called Moscou la Sainte? How many churches are there in Moscow?" he asked.

And when told that there were upwards of two hundred, he asked:—

"What is the good of such a host of churches?"

"The Russians are very religious," replied Balashof.

"Nevertheless, a great number of monasteries and churches is always a sign that a people are backward," said Napoleon, glancing at Caulaincourt for confirmation in this opinion.

Balashof respectfully begged leave to differ from the French emperor's opinion.

"Every country has its own customs," said he.

"But nowhere else in Europe is there anything like it," remarked Napoleon.

"I beg your majesty's pardon," replied Balashof.

"In Spain as well as in Russia there are many monasteries and churches."

This reply of Balashof's, which glanced at the recent defeat of the French in Spain, was highly appreciated when Balashof repeated it at the Emperor Alexander's court; but it was very little appreciated at Napoleon's table, and passed unnoticed.

The indifferent and perplexed faces of the marshals plainly betrayed the fact that they did not understand where the point of the remark came in, or realize Balashof's insinuation. 'If that had been witty, then we should have understood it; consequently it could not have been witty,' the marshals' faces seemed to say. So little was this remark appreciated that even Napoleon did not notice it, and naively asked Balashof the names of the cities through which the direct road to Moscow led.

Balashof, who throughout the dinner was on the alert, replied, "Just as all roads lead to Rome, so all roads lead to Moscow;" that there were many roads, and that among these different routes was the one that passed through Pultava, which Charles XII. had chosen. Thus replied Balashof, involuntarily flushing with delight at the cleverness of this answer. Balashof had hardly pronounced the word "Pultava" when Caulaincourt began to complain of the difficulties of the route from Petersburg to Moscow and to recall his Petersburg experiences.

After dinner they went into Napoleon's cabinet to drink their coffee; four days before it had been the Emperor Alexander's cabinet; Napoleon sat down, stirring his coffee in a Sèvres cup, and pointed Balashof to a chair near him.

There is a familiar state of mind which comes over a man after a dinner, and, acting with greater force than all the dictates of mere reason, compels him to be satisfied with himself and to consider all men his friends. Napoleon was now in this comfortable mental condition. It seemed to him that he was surrounded by men who adored him. He was persuaded that even Balashof, after having eaten dinner with him, was his friend and worshiper. Napoleon addressed him with a pleasant and slightly satirical smile:—

"This is the very room, I am informed, which the Emperor Alexander used. Strange, is n't it, general?" he asked, evidently not having any idea that such a remark could fail to be agreeable to his guest, as it insinuated that he, Napoleon, was superior to Alexander. Balashof could have nothing to reply to this, and merely inclined his head.

"Yes, in this room, four days ago, Winzengerode and Stein were holding council," pursued Napoleon, with the same self-confident, satirical smile. "What I cannot understand is that the Emperor Alexander has taken to himself all my personal enemies. I do not.... understand it. Has it never occurred to him that I might do the same thing?"

And this question, directed to Balashof, evidently aroused his recollection of the cause of his morning’s fury, which was still fresh in his mind.

"And have him know that I will do so," said Napoleon, getting up and pushing away his cup. "I will drive all his kindred out of Germany,—those of Würtemberg, Weimar, Baden.... yes, I will drive them all out. Let him be getting ready for them an asylum in Russia!"

Balashof bowed, and signified that he was anxious to withdraw, and that he listened simply because he could not help listening to what Napoleon said. But Napoleon paid no heed to this motion; he addressed Balashof not as his enemy’s envoy, but as a man who was for the time being entirely devoted to him and must needs rejoice in the humiliation of his former master.

"And why has the Emperor Alexander assumed the command of his forces? What is the reason of it? War is my trade, and his is to rule and not to command armies. Why has he taken upon him such responsibilities?"

Napoleon again took his snuff-box, silently strode several times from one end of the room to the other, and then suddenly and unexpectedly went straight up to Balashof, and with a slight smile he unhesitatingly, swiftly, simply,... as if he were doing something not only important, but even rather agreeable to Balashof,... put his hand into the Russian general’s face, and, taking hold of his ear, gave it a little pull, the smile being on his lips alone.

To have one’s ear pulled by the emperor was considered the greatest honor and favor at the French court.

"Well, have you nothing to say, admirer and courtier of the Emperor Alexander?" asked Napoleon, as if it were an absurdity in his presence to be courtisan et admirateur of any one besides himself. "Are the horses ready for the general?" he added, slightly bending his head in answer to Balashof's bow. "Give him mine, he has far to go." ....

The letter which was intrusted to Balashof was the last that Napoleon ever wrote to Alexander. All the particulars of the interview were communicated to the Russian emperor, and the war began. ....

CHAPTER VIII

After his interview with Pierre, Prince Andrei went to Petersburg on business, as he told his relatives, but in reality to find Prince Anatol Kuragin there, since he considered it his bounden duty to fight him. But Kuragin, whom he inquired after as soon as he reached Petersburg, was no longer there. Pierre had sent word to his brother-in-law that Prince Andrei was in search of him. Anatol Kuragin had immediately secured an appointment from the minister of war, and gone to the Moldavian army.

During this visit to Petersburg Prince Andrei met Kutuzof, his former general, who was always well disposed to him, and Kutuzof proposed that he should go with him to the Moldavian army, of which the old general had been appointed commander-in-chief. Prince Andrei, having thereupon received his appointment as one of the commander's staff, started for Turkey.

Prince Andrei felt that it would not be becoming to write Kuragin and challenge him. Having no new pretext for a duel, he felt that a challenge from him would compromise the Countess Rostova, and therefore he sought for a personal interview with Kuragin, when he hoped he should be able to invent some new pretext for the duel. But in Turkey also he failed of finding Kuragin, who had returned to Russia as soon as he learned of Prince Andrei's arrival.

In a new country, and under new conditions, life began to seem easier to Prince Andrei. After the faithlessness of his betrothed, which had affected him all the more seriously from his very endeavor to conceal from all the grief that it had really caused him, the conditions of life in which he had found so much happiness had grown painful to him, and still more painful the very freedom and independence which he had in times gone by prized so highly. He not only ceased to harbor those thoughts which had for the first time occurred to him as he looked at the heavens on the field of Austerlitz, which he so loved to develop with Pierre, and which were the consolations of his solitude at Bogucharovo, and afterwards in Switzerland and Rome; but he even feared to bring up the recollection of these thoughts, which opened up such infinite and bright horizons. He now concerned himself solely with the narrowest and most practical interests, entirely disconnected with the past, and busied himself with these with all the greater avidity because the things that were past were kept from his remembrance. That infinite, ever-retreating vault of the heavens which at that former time had arched above him had, as it were, suddenly changed into one low and finite oppression, where all was clear but there was nothing eternal and mysterious.

Of all the activities that offered themselves to his choice, the military service was the simplest and best known to him. Accepting the duties of general inspector on Kutuzof's staff, he entered into his work so doggedly and perseveringly that Kutuzof was amazed at his zeal and punctuality.

Not finding Kuragin in Turkey, Prince Andrei did not think it worth his while to follow him back to Russia; but still he was well aware that, no matter how long a time should elapse, it would be impossible for him, in spite of all the scorn which he felt for him, in spite of all the arguments which he used in his own mind to prove that he ought not to stoop to any encounter with him, he was aware, I say, that if ever he met him he would be obliged to challenge him, just as a starving man throws himself on food. And this consciousness that the insult had not yet been avenged, that his anger had not been vented, but still lay on his heart, poisoned that artificial serenity which Prince Andrei by his apparently indefatigable and somewhat ambitious and ostentatious activity procured for himself in Turkey.

When, in 1812, the news of the war with Napoleon reached Bukarest, — where for two months Kutuzof had been living, spending his days and nights with his Wallachian mistress, — Prince Andrei asked his permission to be transferred to the western army. Kutuzof, who had already grown weary of the excess of Bolkonsky's activity, which was a constant reproach to his own indolence, willingly granted his request, and gave him a commission to Barclay de Tolly.

Before joining the army, which, during the month of May, was encamped at Drissa, Prince Andrei drove to Luisiya Gorui, which was directly in his route, being only three versts from the Smolensk highway.

During the last three years of Prince Andrei's life, there had been so many changes; he had thought so much, felt so much, seen so much, — for he had traveled through both the East and the West, — that he felt a sense of strangeness, of unexpected amazement, to find at Luisiya Gorui exactly the same manner of life even to the smallest details. As he entered the driveway, and passed the stone gates that guarded his paternal home, it seemed as if it were an enchanted castle, where everything was fast asleep. The same sobriety, the same neatness, the same quietude, reigned in the house; the same furniture, the same walls, the same sounds, the same odor, and the same timid faces, only grown a little older.

The Princess Mariya was the same timid, plain person, only grown into an old maid, and living out the best years of her life in fear and eternal moral sufferings, without profit and without happiness. Bourienne was the same coquettish, self-satisfied person, cheerfully getting profit out of every moment of her life, and consoling herself with the most exuberant hopes; only it seemed to Prince Andrei that she showed an increase of assurance.
The tutor, Dessalles, whom Prince Andreï had brought from Switzerland, wore an overcoat of Russian cut; his unmanageable tongue involved itself in Russian speech with the servants, but otherwise he was the same pious and pedantic tutor of somewhat limited intelligence.

The only physical change in the old prince was a gap left in one corner of his mouth, caused by the loss of a tooth; morally, he was just the same as before, only with an accentuation of his ugly temper and his distrust in the genuineness of everything that was done in the world.

Nikolushka, with his rosy cheeks and dark, curly hair, had been the one person to grow and change; and, when he laughed and was merry, he unconsciously lifted the upper lip of his pretty little mouth, just as the lamented princess, his mother, had done. He, alone, refused to obey the laws of immutability in this enchanted, sleeping castle. But, though externally everything remained as it had always been, the internal relations of all these people had altered since Prince Andreï had seen them.

The members of the household were divided into two alien and hostile camps, which made common cause now simply because he was there,—for his sake changing the ordinary course of their lives. To the one party belonged the old prince, Bourienne, and the architect, to the other, the Princess Mariya, Dessalles, Nikolushka, and all the women of the establishment.

During his brief stay at Luisiya Gorui, all the family dined together; but it was awkward for them all, and Prince Andreï felt that he was a guest for whose sake an exception was made, and that his presence was a constraint on them. At dinner, the first day, Prince Andreï, instinctively feeling this, was taciturn; and the old prince, remarking the unnaturalness of his behavior, also relapsed into a moody silence, and, immediately after dinner, retired to his room. When, later, Prince Andreï joined him there, and, with the desire of entertaining him, began to tell him about the young Count Kamiensky's campaign, the old prince unexpectedly broke out into a tirade against the Princess Mariya, blaming her for her superstition and for her dislike of Mlle. Bourienne, who, according to him, was the only person truly devoted to him.

The old prince laid the cause of his feeble health entirely to the Princess Mariya, insisting that she all the time annoyed and exasperated him; and that, by her injudicious coddling, and foolish talk, she was spoiling the little Prince Nikolai. The old prince was perfectly well aware that it was he who tormented his daughter, and that her life was rendered exceedingly trying; but he was also aware that he could not help tormenting her, and that she deserved it.

"Why does not Prince Andrei, who sees how things are, say anything to me about his sister?" wondered the old prince. "He thinks, I suppose, that I am a wicked monster, or an old idiot, who has unreasonably estranged himself from his daughter, and taken a French-woman in her place. He does not understand; and so I must explain to him, and he must listen to me," thought the old prince. And he began to expound the reasons that made it impossible to endure his daughter's absurd character.

"Since you ask my opinion," said Prince Andrei, not looking at his father,—for he was condemning him for the first time in his life,—"but I did not wish to talk about it; since you ask me, however, I will tell you frankly my opinion in regard to this matter. If there is any misunderstanding and discord between you and Masha, I could never blame her for it, for I know how she loves and reveres you. And if you ask me further," pursued Prince Andrei, giving way to his irritation, because he had become of late exceedingly prone to fits of irritation, "then I must have one thing to say: if there is any such misunderstanding, the cause of it is that vulgar woman, who is unworthy to be my sister's companion."

The old man at first gazed at his son with staring eyes, and, by his forced smile, uncovered the new gap caused by the loss of the tooth, to which Prince Andrei could not accustom himself.
"What companion, my dear? Ha! Have you already been talking that over? Ha!"

"Batyushka, I do not wish to judge you," said Prince Andrei, in a sharp and choleric voice; "but you have driven me to it; and I have said, and always shall say, that the Princess Mariya is not to blame, but they are to blame—the little Frenchwoman is to blame."....

"Ha! you condemn me!.... you condemn me!" cried the old man, in a subdued voice, and with what seemed confusion to Prince Andrei; but then suddenly he sprang up, and screamed:

"Away! away with you! Don't dare to come here again!"

Prince Andrei intended to take his departure immediately; but the Princess Mariya begged him to stay another day. He did not meet his father that day; the old prince kept in his room, and admitted no one except Mlle. Bourienne and Tikhon; but he inquired several times whether his son had yet gone.

On the following day, just before dinner, Prince Andrei went to his little son's apartment. The blooming lad, with his curly hair, just like his mother's, sat on his knee. Prince Andrei began to tell him the story of Bluebeard; but, right in the midst of it, he lost the thread, and fell into a brown study. He did not give a thought to this pretty little lad, his son, while he held him on his knee, but he was thinking about himself. With a sense of horror, he sought, and failed to find, any remorse in the fact that he had exasperated his father; and no regret that he was about to leave him—after the first quarrel that they had ever had in their lives. More serious than all else was his discovery that he did not feel the affection for his son which he hoped to arouse, as of old, by caressing the lad and taking him on his knee.

"Well, go on, papa!" said the boy.

Prince Andrei, without responding, set him down from his knees, and left the room. The moment Prince Andrei suspended his daily occupations, and especially the moment he encountered the former conditions of his life, in which he had been engaged in the old, happy days, the anguish of life took possession of him with fresh force; and he made all haste to leave the scene of these recollections, and to find occupation as soon as possible.

"Are you really going, André?" asked his sister.

"Thank God, I can go," replied Prince Andreï. "I am very sorry that you cannot also."

"What makes you say so?" exclaimed his sister. "Why do you say so, now that you are going to this terrible war? and he is so old! Mlle. Bourienne told me that he had asked after you."

As soon as she recalled this subject, her lips trembled, and the tears rained down her cheeks. Prince Andreï turned away, and began to pace up and down the room.

"Oh! my God! my God!" he cried. "And how do you conceive that any one—that such a contemptible creature can bring unhappiness to others!" he exclaimed, with such an outburst of anger that it frightened the Princess Mariya. She understood that, in speaking of "such contemptible creatures," he had reference not alone to Mlle. Bourienne, who had caused him misery, but also to that man who had destroyed his happiness.

"André! one thing I want to ask you; I beg of you," said she, lightly touching his elbow and gazing at him with her eyes shining through her tears.—"I understand you." —The Princess Mariya dropped her eyes.—"Do not think that sorrow is caused by men. Men are His instruments." She gazed somewhat above her brother's head, with that confident look that people have who are accustomed to look at the place where they know a portrait hangs. "Sorrow is sent by Him, and comes not from men. Men are His instruments; they are not accountable. If it seem to you that any one is culpable toward you, forget it and forgive. We have no right to punish. And you will find happiness in forgiving."

"Akh! Bozhe moi! Bozhe moi!"
"If I were a woman I would, Marie! Forgiveness is a woman's virtue. But a man has no right and no power to forgive and forget," said he, and, although he was not at that instant thinking of Kuragin, all his unsatisfied vengeance suddenly surged up in his heart. "If the Princess Mariya at this late day urges me to forgive, it is proof positive that I ought long ago to have punished," he said to himself. And, not stopping to argue with his sister, he began to dream of that joy-ful moment of revenge when he should meet Kuragin, who (as he knew) had gone to the army.

The Princess Mariya urged her brother to delay his journey yet another day, assuring him how unhappy her father would be if Andrei went off without a reconcilia-tion with him; but Prince Andrei replied that in all probability he should soon return from the army, that he would certainly write to his father, and that now the longer he stayed the more bitter this quarrel would become.

"Adieu, Andre! remember that sorrows come from God, and that men are never accountable for them;" those were the last words that his sister said as they bade each other farewell.

"Such is our fate!" said Prince Andrei to himself as he turned out of the avenue of the Luisogorsky mansion. "She, poor innocent creature, is left to be devoured by this crazy old man. The old man is conscious that he is doing wrong, but he cannot change his nature. My little lad is growing up and enjoying life, though he will become like all the rest of us, deceivers or deceived. I am going to the army—for what purpose I myself do not know, and I am anxious to meet a man whom I de-spise, so as to give him a chance to kill me and exult over me."

In days gone by the same conditions of life had existed, but then there was a single purpose ramifying through them and connecting them, but now everything was in confusion. Isolated, illogical thoughts, devoid of connection, arose one after another in Prince Andrei's mind.
Prince Andrei reached the army headquarters toward the first of July. The troops of the first division, commanded by the sovereign in person, were intrenched in a fortified camp on the Drissa; the troops of the second division were in retreat, though they were endeavoring to join the first, from which, as the report went, they had been cut off by a strong force of the French. All were dissatisfied with the general conduct of military affairs in the Russian army; but no one ever dreamed of any of the Russian provinces being invaded, and no one had supposed that the war would be carried beyond the western government of Poland.

Prince Andrei found Barclay de Tolly on the bank of the Drissa. As there was no large town or village within easy reach of the camp, all this enormous throng of generals and courtiers who were present with the army were scattered in the best houses of the little villages for a distance of ten versts from the camp, on both sides of the river.

Barclay de Tolly was stationed about four versts from the sovereign.

He gave Bolkonsky a dry and chilling welcome, and, speaking in his strong German accent, told him that he should have to send in his name to the sovereign for any definite employment, but proposed that for the time being he should remain on his staff.

Anatol Kuragin, whom Prince Andrei expected to find at the army, was no longer there; he had gone to Petersburg, and this news was agreeable to Bolonsky. He was absorbed in the interest of being at the very center of a mighty war just beginning, and he was glad to be, for a short time, freed from the provocation which the thought of Kuragin produced in him.

During the first four days, as no special duties were required of him, Prince Andrei made the circuit of the whole fortified camp, and by the aid of his natural intelligence and by making inquiries of men who were well informed, he managed to acquire a very definite comprehension of the position. But the question whether this camp were advantageous or not remained undecided in his mind. He had already come to the conclusion, founded on his own military experience, that even those plans laid with the profoundest deliberation are of little consequence in battle—how plainly he had seen this on the field of Austerlitz!—that everything depends on what was done to meet the unexpected and impossible-to-be-foreseen tactics of the enemy, that all depended on how and by whom the affair was conducted.

Therefore in order to settle this last question in his own mind, Prince Andrei, taking advantage of his position and his acquaintances, tried to penetrate the character of the administration of the armies, and of the persons and parties that took part in it, and he drew up for his own benefit the following digest of the position of affairs.

While the sovereign was still at Vilna, the troops had been divided into three armies: the first was placed under command of Barclay de Tolly; the second under the command of Bagration; the third under command of Tormasof.

The emperor was present with the first division, but not in his quality of commander-in-chief. In the orders of the day it was simply announced that the sovereign would—not take command, but would simply be present with the army. Moreover, the sovereign had no personal staff, as would have been the case had he been commander-in-chief, but only a staff appropriate to the imperial headquarters.

Attached to him were the chief of the imperial staff, the General-Quartermaster Prince Volkonsky, generals, flügel-adjutants, diplomatic chinovniks, and a great throng of foreigners; but these did not form a military staff. Besides these there were attached to his person, but without special functions, Arakcheyef, the ex-minister of war; Count Benigsen, with the rank of senior general; the grand duke, the Tsesarevitch Konstantin Pavlovitch; Count Rumyantsef; the Chancellor Stein, who had been minister in Prussia; Armfeldt, a Swedish general; Pfuhl, the principal originator of the plan of the campaign; Paulucci, general-adjutant and a Sardinian refugee; Woltzogen, and many others.

Although these individuals were present without any special military function, still by their peculiar position they wielded a powerful influence, and oftentimes the chief of the corps, and even the commander-in-chief, did not know in what capacity Benigsen or the grand duke or Arakcheyef or Prince Volkonsky asked questions or proffered advice, and could not tell whether such and such an order, couched in the form of a piece of advice, emanated from the speaker or the sovereign, and whether it was incumbent on him or not incumbent on him to carry it out. But these were merely a stage accessory; the essential idea why the emperor was present and all these men were present was perfectly palpable to all from the point of view of courtiers, and in the presence of the sovereign all were courtiers.

This idea was as follows: The monarch did not assume the title of commander-in-chief, but he exercised control over all the troops; the men who surrounded him were his aids; Arakcheyef was the faithful guardian of law and order, and the sovereign's body-guard. Benigsen was a landowner in the Vilna government, who, as it were, did the honors of the region, and in reality was an excellent general, useful in council, and ready, in case he were needed, to take Barclay's place. The grand duke was there because it was a pleasure for him to be. Ex-Minister Stein was there because he was needed to give advice, and because the Emperor Alexander had a very high opinion of his personal qualities. Armfeldt was Napoleon's bitter enemy, and a general possessed of great confidence in his own ability, which always had an influence upon Alexander. Paulucci was there because he was bold and resolute in speech. The general-adjutants were there because they were always attendant on the sovereign's movements; and, last and not least, Pfuhl was there because he had conceived a plan for the campaign against Napoleon, and had induced Alexander to place his confidence in the expedience of this plan, thereby directing the entire action of the war. Pfuhl was attended by Woltzogen, a keen, self-conceited cabinet-theorist, who scorned all things, and had the skill to dress Pfuhl's schemes in a more pleasing form than Pfuhl himself could.

In addition to these individuals already mentioned, Russians and foreigners,—especially foreigners, who each day proposed new and unexpected plans with that boldness characteristic of men engaged in activities in a land not their own,—there were a throng of subordinates who were present with the army because their principals were there.

Amid all the plans and voices in this tremendous, restless, brilliant, and haughty world, Prince Andrei distinguished the following sharply outlined subdivisions of tendencies and parties.

The first party consisted of Pfuhl and his followers, military theorists, who believed that there was such a thing as a science of war, and that this science had its immutable laws—the laws for oblique movements, for outflanking, and so on. Pfuhl and his followers insisted on retreating into the interior of the country, according to definite principles prescribed by the so-styled science of war, and in every departure from this theory they saw nothing but barbarism, ignorance, or evil intentions. To this party belonged the German princes, and Woltzogen, Winzengerode, and others,—notably the Germans.

The second party was diametrically opposed to the first. And, as always happens, they went to quite opposite extremes. The men of this party were those who insisted on making Vilna the base of a diversion into Poland, and demanded to be freed from all preconceived plans. Not only were the leaders of this party the representatives of the boldest activity, but at the same time they were also the representatives of nationalism, in consequence of which they showed all the more urgency in maintaining their side of the dispute. Such were the Russians Bagration, Yer-molof,—who was just beginning to come into prominence,—and many others. It was at this time that Yermolof's famous jest was quoted extensively: it was said that he asked the emperor to grant him the favor of promoting him to be a German! The men of this party recalled Suvorof, and declared that there was no need of making plans or marking the map up with pins, but to fight, to beat the foe, not to let him enter Russia, and not to let the army lose heart.

The third party, in which the sovereign placed the greatest confidence, consisted of those courtiers who tried to find a compromise between the two previous tendencies. These men—for the most part civilians, and Arakcheyef was in their number—thought and talked as men usually talk who have no convictions but do not wish to show their lack of them. They declared that unquestionably the war, especially with such a genius as Bonaparte,—they now called him Bonaparte again,—demanded the profoundest consideration and a thorough knowledge of the science, and in this respect Pfuhl was endowed with genius; but, at the same time, it was necessary to acknowledge that theorists were often one-sided, and, therefore, it was impossible to have perfect confidence in them; it was best to heed also what Pfuhl's opposers had to say, and also what was said by men who had had practical experience in military affairs, and then to balance the two. The men of this party insisted the camp along the Drissa should be retained, according to Pfuhl's plan; the movements of the other divisions should be changed. Although this action answered no purpose whatever, yet it seemed advisable to the men of this party.

The fourth tendency was the one of which the conspicuous representative was the grand duke, the Tsesarevitch Konstantin, heir-apparent to the throne, who could not forget his disappointment at the battle of Austerlitz, when he rode out at the head of his guards, dressed in 1 Any son of the Tsar is properly tsarevitch, but the crown prince bears the distinctive title tsesarevich (son of the Cesar). Count Tolstof emphasizes his position by using also the term naslyednik, successor, heir.

casque and jacket as for a parade, expecting to drive the French gallantly before him, and, unexpectedly finding himself at the very front, was, in spite of everything, involved in the general confusion. The men of this party showed in their opinions both sincerity and lack of sincerity. They were afraid of Napoleon; they saw that he was strong while they were weak, and they had no hesitation in saying so. They said:—

"Nothing but misfortune, ignominy, and defeat will come out of all this. Here we have abandoned Vilna; we have abandoned Vitebsk; we shall abandon the Drissa in like manner. The only thing left for us to do in all reason is to conclude peace, and as speedily as possible, before we are driven out of Petersburg."

This opinion, widely current in the upper spheres of the army, found acceptance also in Petersburg, and was supported by the Chancellor Rumyantsof, who for other reasons of state was also anxious for peace.

A fifth party was formed by those who were partisans of Barclay de Tolly not as a man, but simply because he was minister of war and commander-in-chief. These said: “Whatever he is,” — and that was the way they always began, — “he is an honest, capable man, and he has no superior. Give him actual power because the war can never come to any successful issue without some one in sole control, and then he will show what he can do, just as he proved it in Finland. If our army is well organized and powerful, and made the retreat to the Drissa without suffering any loss, we owe it to this Barclay alone. If now Barclay is replaced by Benigsen, all will go to rack and ruin, because Benigsen made an exhibition of his incapacity in 1807,” said the men of this party.

A sixth party — the Benigsenists — claimed the contrary; that there was no one more capable and experienced than Benigsen, “and, however far they go out of his way, they’ll have to return to him.” “Let them make their mistakes now!” And the men of this party argued that our whole retreat to the Drissa was a disgraceful defeat and an uninterrupted series of blunders.
"The more blunders they make now the better, or, at least, the sooner they will discover that things cannot go on in this way," said they. "Such a man as Barclay is not needed, but a man like Benigsen, who showed what he was in 1807. Napoleon himself has done him justice, and he is a man whose authority all would gladly recognize, and only such a man is Benigsen."

The seventh party consisted of men such as are always found especially around young monarchs,—and the Emperor Alexander had a remarkable number of such,—namely, generals and flügel-adjutants who were passionately devoted to their sovereign, not as an emperor, but as a man whom they worshiped heartily and disinterestedly, just as Rostof had worshiped him in 1805, and who saw in him not only all virtues but all human qualities. These men, although they praised their sovereign's modesty in declining to assume the duties of commander-in-chief, still criticized this excess of modesty, and had only one desire which they insisted on, that their adored monarch, overcoming his excessive lack of confidence in himself, should openly announce that he would take his place at the head of his armies, gather around him the appropriate staff of a commander-in-chief, and while consulting in cases of necessity with theorists and practical men of experience, himself lead his troops, who by this mere fact would be roused to the highest pitch of enthusiasm.

The eighth and by all odds the largest group of men, which in comparison with the others all put together would rank as ninety-nine to one, consisted of men who desired neither peace nor war nor offensive operations, nor a defensive camp on the Drissa nor anywhere else, nor Barclay, nor the sovereign, nor Pfuhl, nor Benigsen, but simply wished one and the same essential thing: the utmost possible advantages and enjoyments for themselves. In these troubled waters of intertangled and complicated intrigues which abounded at the sovereign's headquarters, it became possible to succeed in many things which would have been out of the question at any other time. One whose sole desire was not to lose his advantageous position was to-day on Pfuhl's side, to-morrow allied with his opponent, on the day following, for the sake merely of shirking responsibility and pleasing the sovereign, would declare that he had no opinion in regard to some well-known matter.

A second, anxious to curry favor, would attract the sovereign's attention by boisterously advocating at the top of his voice something which the sovereign had merely hinted at the day before, by arguing and yelling at the council meeting, pounding himself in the chest, and challenging to a duel any one who took the other side, and thereby show how ready he was to be a martyr for the public weal.

A third would simply demand between two meetings of the council and while his enemies were out of sight a definitive subvention in return for his faithful service of the state, knowing very well that they would never be able to refuse him. A fourth would as if by accident keep letting the sovereign see how overwhelmed with work he was! A fifth, in order to attain his long-cherished ambition of being invited to dine at the sovereign's table, would stubbornly argue the right or wrong of some newly conceived opinion and bring up for this purpose more or less powerful and well-founded arguments.

All the men of this party were hungry for rubles, honorary crosses, promotions, and in their pursuit of these things they watched the direction of the weathercock of the sovereign's favor, and just as soon as it was seen that the weathercock pointed in any one direction, all this population of military drones would begin to blow in the same direction so that it was sometimes all the harder for the sovereign to change about to the other side. In this uncertainty of position, in presence of a real danger which was threatening and which impressed upon everything a peculiarly disquieting character, amid this vortex of intrigues, selfish ambitions, collisions, diverse opinions and feelings, with all the variety of nationalities represented by all these men, this eighth and by far the largest party of men, occupied with private interests, gave great complication and confusion to affairs in general. Whatever question came up, instantly this swarm of drones, before they had finished their buzzing over the previous theme, would fly off to the new one, and deafen every one and entirely drown out the genuine voices who had something of worth to say.

Just about the time Prince Andrei arrived at the army, still a ninth party was forming out of all these others, and beginning to let its voice be heard. This was the party of veteran statesmen, men of sound wisdom and experience, who, sharing in none of all these contradictory opinions, were able to look impartially upon all that was going on at headquarters and to devise means for escaping from this vagueness, indecision, confusion, and weakness.

The men of this party said and thought that nothing but mischief resulted preeminently from the presence of the sovereign with a military court at the front, introducing into the army that indeterminate, conditional, and fluctuating irregularity of relations which, however useful at court, were ruinous to the troops; that it was the monarch's business to govern, and not to direct the army; that the only cure for all these troubles was for the sovereign and his court to take their departure; that the mere fact of the emperor being with the army paralyzed the movements of fifty thousand men who were required to protect him from personal peril; that the most incompetent general-in-chief, if he were independent, would be better than the best, hampered by the sovereign's presence.

While Prince Andrei was at Drissa, without stated position, Shishkof, the imperial secretary, who was one of the chief members of this faction, wrote the sovereign a letter which Balashof and Arakeheyef agreed to sign. Taking advantage of the permission accorded him by the sovereign to make suggestions concerning the general course of events, he respectfully, and under the pretext that it was necessary for the sovereign to stir the people of the capital to fresh enthusiasm for this war, in this letter proposed that he should leave the army.

The mission of fanning the enthusiasm of the people and of summoning them to defend the fatherland, the very thing that led to the ultimate triumph of Russia,—and his personal presence in Moscow contributed largely to this end,—was therefore offered to the emperor and accepted by him as a pretext for taking his departure from the army.

CHAPTER X

This letter had not as yet been placed in the sovereign's hands, when Barclay at dinner informed Bolkonsky that his majesty would be pleased to have a personal interview with him, in order to make some inquiries concerning Turkey, and that he, Prince Andrei, was to present himself at Benigsen's headquarters at six o'clock that evening.

On that day a report had been brought to the sovereign's headquarters concerning a new movement on the part of Napoleon which might prove dangerous for the army—a report which was afterward found to be false, however. And on that same morning, Colonel Michaud, in company with the emperor, had ridden around the fortifications on the Drissa and had proved conclusively to the sovereign that this fortified camp, which had been laid out under Pfuhl's direction and had been up to that time considered a masterpiece of tactical skill destined to be the ruin of Napoleon,—that this camp was a piece of folly and a source of danger for the Russian army.

Prince Andrei proceeded to the headquarters of General Benigsen, who had established himself in a small villa on the very bank of the river. Neither Benigsen nor the sovereign was there; but Chernuishef, one of the emperor's aides, received Bolkonsky and explained that the sovereign had gone with General Benigsen and the Marchese Paulucci for a second time that day on a tour of inspection of the fortified camp of the Drissa, as to the utility of which serious doubts had begun to be conceived.

Chernuishef was sitting with a French novel at one of the windows of the front room. This room had at one time probably been a ball-room; there still stood in it an organ on which were piled a number of rugs, and in one corner stood the folding bed belonging to Benigsen's aide. This aide was there. Apparently overcome by some merry-making or perhaps by work, he lay stretched out on the bed and was fast asleep.

Two doors led from this ball-room: one directly into the former drawing-room, the other to the right into the library. Through the first, voices were heard conversing in German and occasionally in French. Yonder, in that former drawing-room, were gathered together at the sovereign's request, not a council of war—for the sovereign was fond of indefiniteness—but a meeting of a number of men whose opinions concerning the existing difficulties he was anxious to learn. It was not a council of war, but a sort of committee of gentlemen convened to explain certain questions for the sovereign's personal gratification. To this semi-council were invited the Swedish general Armfeldt, General-Adjutant Woltzogen, Winzengerode, whom Napoleon had called a fugitive French subject, Michaud, Toll, who was also not at all a military man, Count Stein, and finally Pfuhl himself, who, as Prince Andreï had already heard, was la cheville ouvrière—the mainspring—of the whole affair. Prince Andreï had an opportunity of getting a good look at him, as Pfuhl arrived shortly after he did and came into the drawing-room, where he stood for a minute or two talking with Chernuishef.

Pfuhl, dressed like a Russian general, in a badly made uniform which fitted him clumsily, seemed to Prince Andreï at first glance like an old acquaintance, although he had never seen him before. He was of the same type as Weirother and Mack and Schmidt and many other German theorist-generals whom Prince Andreï had seen in 1805; but he was more characteristic of the type than all the rest. Never in his life had Prince Andreï seen a German theorist who so completely united in himself all that was typical of those Germans.

Pfuhl was short and very thin, but big-boned, of coarse, healthy build, with a broad pelvis and prominent shoulder-blades. His face was full of wrinkles, and he had deep-set eyes. His hair had been evidently brushed in some haste forward by the temples, but behind it stuck out in droll little tufts. Looking about sternly and restlessly, he came into the room as if he were afraid of every one. With awkward gestures grasping his sword, he turned to Chernuishef and asked in German where the emperor was. It was evident that he was anxious to make the round of the room as speedily as possible, to put an end to the salutations and greetings, and to seat himself before the map, where he felt quite at home. He abruptly tossed his head in reply to Chernuishef’s answer and smiled ironically at the report that the sovereign had gone to inspect the fortifications which Pfuhl himself had constructed in accordance with his theory. In a deep, gruff voice characteristic of all self-conceited Germans, he grumbled to himself:—

“Blockhead! — Ruin the whole business; pretty state of things will be the result.”

Prince Andrei did not listen to him and was about to go, but Chernuishef introduced him to Pfuhl, remarking that he had just come from Turkey, where the war had been brought to a successful termination. Pfuhl gave a fleeting glance, not so much at Prince Andrei as through him, and muttered with a smile:—

“That must have been a fine tactical campaign.”

And, scornfully smiling, he went into the room where the voices were heard.

Evidently Pfuhl, who was always disposed to be ironical and irritable, was on this day especially stirred up because they had dared without him to inspect his camp and criticize him.

1 Dummkopf! — Zum Grunde die ganze Geschichte — ‘s wird was gescheites d’raus werden.
2 Da muss ein schöner tactischer Krieg gewesen sein.
Prince Andrei, simply by this brief interview with Pfuhl, reinforced by his experiences at Austerlitz, had gained a sufficiently clear insight into the character of this man. Pfuhl was one of those hopelessly, unalterably self-confident men who would suffer martyrdom rather than yield his opinion, a genuine German, for the very reason that only Germans are absolutely certain, in their own minds, of the solid foundation of that abstract idea, — Science; that is to say, the assumed knowledge of absolute truth.

The Frenchman is self-confident because he considers himself individually, both as regards mind and body, irresistibly captivating to either men or women. The Englishman is self-confident through his absolute conviction that he is a citizen of the most fortunately constituted kingdom in the world, and because, as an Englishman, he knows always and in all circumstances what it is requisite for him to do, and also knows that all that he does as an Englishman is correct beyond cavil. The Italian is self-confident because he is excitable, and easily forgets himself and others. The Russian is self-confident for the precise reason that he knows nothing, and wishes to know nothing, because he believes that it is impossible to know anything. But the German is self-confident in a worse way than all the rest, above and beyond all the rest, because he imagines that he knows the truth, — the science which he has himself invented, but which for him is absolute truth!

Evidently such a man was Pfuhl. He had his science, — the theory of oblique movements, which he had deduced from the history of the wars of Friedrich the Great, — and everything that he saw in the warfare of more recent date seemed to him nonsense, barbarism, ignorant collisions in which, on both sides, so many errors were committed that these wars had no right to be called wars. They did not come under his theory, and could not be judged as a subject for science.

In 1806 Pfuhl had been one of those who elaborated the plan of the campaign that culminated at Jena and Auerstadt, but the unfortunate issue of that campaign did not open his eyes to see the slightest fault in his theory. On the contrary, the fact that his theory had been, to a certain extent, abandoned, was in his mind the sole cause of the whole failure; and he said, in the tone of self-satisfied irony characteristic of him, "Ich sagte ja dass die ganze Geschichte zum Teufel gehen werde, — I predicted that the whole thing would go to the deuce."

Pfuhl was one of those theorists who are so in love with their theory that they forget the object of the theory, its relation to practice. In his love for his theory he hated everything practical, and could not listen to it. He even delighted in the failure of any enterprise, because this failure, resulting from the abandonment of theory for practice, was proof positive to him of how correct his theory was.

He spoke a few words with Prince Andrei and Chernuishef about the existing war, and his expression was that of a man who knew in advance that all was going to the dogs, and that he, for one, did not much regret the fact. The little tufts of unkempt hair that stuck out on his occiput, and the hastily brushed love-locks around his temples, spoke eloquently of this.

He went into the adjoining room, and instantly they heard the deep and querulous sounds of his voice.

CHAPTER XI

Prince Andrei had no time to let his eyes follow Pfuhl, as Count Benigsen just at that moment came hastily into the room, and, inclining his head to Bolkonsky, but not pausing, went directly into the library, giving his adjutant some order as he went. Benigsen had hurried home in advance of the sovereign in order to make some preparations, and to be there to receive him.

Chernuishef and Prince Andrei went out on the steps. The emperor, looking fatigued, was dismounting from his horse. The Marchese Paulucci was making some remark. The sovereign, with his head bent over to the left, was listening with a discontented air to Paulucci, who was speaking with his usual vehemence. The sovereign started forward, evidently desirous of cutting short this harangue; but the flushed and excited Italian, forgetting the proprieties, followed him, still talking.

"As for the man who advised this camp, the camp of Drissa," Paulucci was saying, just as the sovereign, mounting the steps and perceiving Prince Andrei, glanced into his face, not at first recognizing him. "As to him, sire," pursued Paulucci, in a state of desperation, as if quite unable to control himself,—"as for the man who advised this camp of Drissa, I see no other alternative for him than the insane asylum or the gallows."

The sovereign, not waiting for the Italian to finish what he had to say, and apparently not even hearing his words, came closer to Bolkonsky, and, recognizing him, addressed him graciously:—

"I am very glad to see you. Come in where the meeting is, and wait for me."

The sovereign went into the cabinet. He was followed by Prince Piotr Mikhaïlovitch Volkonsky and Baron Stein, and the doors were shut. Prince Andrei, taking advantage of the sovereign's permission, joined Paulucci, whom he had known in Turkey, and went into the drawing-room where the council was held. Prince Piotr Mikhaïlovitch Volkonsky held the position of nachalnik, or chief, of the sovereign's staff. Volkonsky came out of the cabinet and carried into the drawing-room a quantity of maps and papers, and after he had laid them on the table he communicated the questions in regard to which he was anxious to have the opinions of the gentlemen present. The questions arose from the fact that news, afterwards proved to be false, had been received the night before concerning a movement of the French toward outflanking the camp on the Drissa.
General Armfeldt was the first to begin the debate, and he unexpectedly proposed, as an escape from the impending difficulty, that they should choose an entirely new position at a little distance from the highways leading to Moscow and Petersburg; and there, as he expressed it, let the army be increased to its full strength, and await the enemy. No one could see any reason for his advocating such a scheme, unless it came from his desire to show that he, as well as the rest, had ideas of his own.

It was evident that Armfeldt had long ago evolved this scheme, and that he proposed it now not so much with the design of responding to the questions laid before the meeting — questions which this scheme of his entirely failed to answer — as it was with the design of using his chance to enunciate it. This was one of the millions of proposals which, not having any reference to the character which the war was likely to assume, had equally as good foundations as others of the same sort for successful accomplishment.

Some of those present attacked his suggestions, others defended them. The young Colonel Toll attacked the opinions of the Swedish general more fiercely than the others, and during the discussion took out of his side pocket a manuscript note-book, which he begged permission to read. In this diffusely elaborated manuscript Toll proposed still another plan of campaign, diametrically the opposite of those suggested by Armfeldt and Pfuhl.

Paulucci, combating Toll, proposed the plan of an advance and attack, which, according to his views, was the only possible way to extricate us from the present suspense, and from the "trap," as he called the camp on the Drissa, in which we now found ourselves.

During the course of these discussions and criticisms Pfuhl and Woltzogen, his interpreter (his "bridge," in court parlance), maintained silence. Pfuhl merely snorted scornfully and turned away, signifying that he would never sink so low as to reply to all this rubbish to which he was now listening. So when Prince Volkonsky, as chairman of the meeting, called on him to express his opinion, he merely said:—

"Why do you ask me? General Armfeldt has proposed a beautiful position, with the rear exposed, and you have heard about the offensive operations proposed by this Italian gentleman. Sehr schön! Or the retreat. Auch gut! So why do you ask me?" he replied; "for, you see, you yourselves know more about all this than I do."

But when Volkonsky frowned, and said that he asked his opinion in the name of the sovereign, then Pfuhl got up, and, growing suddenly excited, began to speak:—

"Everything has been spoiled, everything been thrown into confusion. All pretend to know more than I do, but now they come to me. How can things be remedied? There's no possibility of remedying them. It is necessary to carry out to the letter my design, on the lines which I have laid down," said he, pounding the table with his bony knuckles. "Where is the difficulty? Rubbish! Kinderspiel!"

He stepped up to the table and began to talk rapidly, scratching with his finger-nail on the map, and demonstrating that no contingency could alter the effectiveness of the camp on the Drissa; that everything had been foreseen, and that if the enemy were actually to out-flank them, then the enemy would be inevitably annihilated.

Paulucci, who did not understand German, began to question him in French. Woltzogen came to the aid of his leader, who spoke French but badly, and began to translate his words, though he could hardly keep up with Pfuhl, who rapidly demonstrated that everything, everything, not only what had happened, but whatever could possibly happen, had been provided for in his plan; and that, if there were any complications, the whole blame lay simply in the fact that his plan had not been accurately carried out. He kept smiling ironically as he made his demonstration, and finally he scornfully stopped adducing arguments, just as a mathematician ceases to verify the various steps of a problem which has once been found correctly solved. Woltzogen took his place, proceeding to explain in French his ideas, and occasionally turning to Pfuhl with a "Nicht wahr, Excellenz?" for confirmation.

Pfuhl, like a man so excited in a battle that he attacks his own side, cried testily to his own faithful follower, to Woltzogen:

"Why, of course; it’s as plain as daylight!" ¹

Paulucci and Michaud both at once fell on Woltzogen in French, Armfeldt addressed a question to Pfuhl in German, Toll explained the matter in Russian to Prince Volkonsky. Prince Andreï listened without speaking, and watched the proceedings.

Of all these individuals the exasperated, earnest, and absurdly opinionated Pfuhl awoke the most sympathy in Prince Andreï. He alone, of all present, evidently had no taint of self-seeking, nor had he any hatred of any one, but simply desired that his plan, elaborated from his theory which had been deduced from his studies during long years, should be carried into execution. He was ridiculous, his use of sarcasm made him disagreeable; but at the same time he awakened involuntary respect by his boundless devotion to an idea.

Besides, in all the remarks made by those who were present, with the sole exception of Pfuhl’s, there was one common feature which had never been manifested in the council of war in the year 1805, and this was the secret but panic fear — dissembled — of Napoleon’s genius; it showed itself in every argument. They took it for granted that Napoleon could do anything. They looked for him on every side, and by his terrible name each one of them demolished the proposals of the other. Pfuhl alone, it seemed, regarded even Napoleon as a barbarian, like all the other opponents of his theory.

Pfuhl awakened in Prince Andreï a feeling of pity as well as of respect. By the tone in which the courtiers addressed him, by the way in which Paulucci had permitted himself to speak of him to the emperor, and, chiefly, by a certain despairing expression manifested by Pfuhl himself, it was plain to see that the others knew, and he himself felt, that his fall was at hand. And, aside from his self-conceit and his grumbling German irony, he was pitiable by reason of his hair brushed forward into little love-locks on his temples, and the little tufts standing out on his occiput. Although he did his best to dissimulate it under the guise of exasperation and scorn, he was in despair because his only chance of showing his theory on a tremendous scale, and proving its value before all the world, was slipping from him.

¹ Nun ja! was soll denn da noch expliziert werden!

The discussion lasted a long time, and the longer it lasted the more heated grew the arguments, which were like quarrels by reason of the raised voices and personalities; and the less possible was it to come to any general conclusion from all that was said. Prince Andrei, listening to this polyglot debate and these propositions, plans and counter-plans, and shouts, was simply astonished at what they all said. The idea which had early and often suggested itself to him during the time of his former military service, — that there was not, and could not be, any such thing as a military science, and consequently could not be any so-called military genius, — now seemed to him a truth beyond a peradventure.

"How can there be any theory and science in a matter the conditions and circumstances of which are unknown and cannot be determined, — in which the force employed by those who make the war is still less capable of measurement? No one can possibly know what will be the position of our army and that of the enemy's a day from now, and no one can know what is the force of this or that division. Sometimes, when there is no coward in the front to cry, 'We are cut off!' and to start the panic, and there is a jovial, audacious man there to shout, 'Hurrah!' a division of five thousand is worth thirty thousand, as was the case at Schöngraben; and sometimes fifty thousand will fly before eight, as happened at Austerlitz. What science, then, can there be in such a business, where nothing can be predetermined, as in any practical business, and where everything depends on numberless conditions, the resolving of which is defined at some one moment, but when — no one can possibly foretell. Armfeldt says that our army is cut off, and Paulucci declares that we have got the French army between two fires. Michaud says that the uselessness of the camp on the Drissa consists in this, that the river is back of it, while Pfuhl declares that therein consists its strength. Toll proposes one plan, Armfeldt proposes another, and all are good and all are bad, and the advantages of each and every proposition can be proved only at the moment when the event occurs. And why do they all use the term, 'military genius'? Is that man a genius who manages to keep his army well supplied with biscuits, and commands them to go, some to the left and some to the right? Merely because military men are clothed with glory and power, and crowds of sycophants are always ready to flatter Power, ascribing to it the inappropriate attributes of genius. On the other hand, the best generals whom I have ever known were stupid or absent-minded men. The best was Bagration; Napoleon himself called him so. And Bonaparte himself! I remember his self-satisfied and narrow-minded face on the field of Austerlitz. A good leader on the field of battle needs not genius or any of the special qualities so much as he needs the exact opposite, or the lack of the highest human qualities — love, poetry, affection, a philosophical, investigating skepticism. He must be narrow-minded, firmly convinced that what he is doing is absolutely essential (otherwise he will not have patience), and then only will he be a brave leader. God pity him if he is a man who has any love for any one, or any pity, or has any scruples about right or wrong. It is perfectly comprehensible that in old times they invented a theory of geniuses because they held power. Credit for success in battle depends not on them but on that man in the ranks who cries, 'They have fled!' or who shouts 'Hurrah!' And only in these ranks can you serve with any assurance that you are of service.”

Thus mused Prince Andrei as he listened to the arguments, and he came out of his brown study only when Paulucci called him and the meeting was already dissolved.

On the following day, during a review, the sovereign asked Prince Andrei where he preferred to serve, and Prince Andrei forever lost caste in the eyes of the courtiers because he did not ask for a place near the sovereign's person, but asked permission to enter active service.

CHAPTER XII

Rostof, before the opening of the campaign, received a letter from his parents, in which, after briefly announcing Natasha’s illness and the rupture of the engagement with Prince Andrei,—this rupture, they explained, was Natasha’s own work,—they again urged him to retire from the service and come home.

Nikolaï, on receipt of this letter, made no attempt to secure either a furlough or permission to go upon the retired list, but wrote his parents that he was very sorry for Natasha’s illness and breach with her lover, and that he would do all that he possibly could to fulfil their desires. He wrote a separate letter to Sonya.

"Adored friend of my heart," he wrote, "nothing except honor could keep me from returning home. But just now, at the opening of the campaign, I should consider myself disgraced not only before all my comrades, but in my own eyes, if I were to prefer my pleasure to my duty, and my love to my country. But this is our last separation. Be assured that immediately after the war, if I am alive and you still love me, I will give up everything and fly to thee to clasp thee forever to my ardent heart!"

He was telling the truth—it was only the opening of the campaign that detained Nikolaï and prevented him from fulfilling his promise by at once returning home and marrying Sonya. The autumn at Otradnoye, with its sport, and the winter with the Christmas holidays, and his love for Sonya, had opened up before him a whole perspective of the pleasures of a country nobleman, and of domestic contentment, which he had never known before and which now beckoned to him with their sweet allurements.

"A glorious wife, children, a good pack of hunting-dogs, a leash of ten or twenty spirited greyhounds, the management of the estate, the neighbors, and service at the elections," he said to himself. But now there was a war in prospect, and he was obliged to remain with his regiment. And, since this was a matter of necessity, Nikolaï Rostof, in accordance with his character, was content with the life which he led in the regiment, and had the skill to arrange it so that it was agreeable.

On his return from his furlough, having met with a cordial reception from his comrades, Nikolaï was sent out to secure fresh horses; and he brought back with him from Little Russia an excellent remount, which gladdened his own heart, and procured for him the praise of his superiors. During his absence he had been promoted to the rank of rotmistr, or captain of cavalry, and, when the regiment was restored to a war footing, with increased complement, he was put in charge of his former squadron.

The campaign had begun; the regiment was moved into Poland, double pay was granted; there were new officers present, new men and horses, and, above all, there was an increase of that excitement and bustle which always accompanies the beginning of a campaign; and Rostof, recognizing his advantageous position in the regiment, gave himself up, heart and soul, to the pleasures and interests of military service, although he knew well that, sooner or later, he would have to leave it.

The troops evacuated Vilna for various complicated reasons—imperial, political, and tactical. At headquarters, every step of the retreat was accompanied by a complicated play of interests, arguments, and passions. For the hussars of the Pavlogradsky regiment, all this backward movement, in the best part of the summer, with abundance of provisions, was a most simple and enjoyable affair. At headquarters, men might lose heart, and grow nervous, and indulge in intrigues to their hearts' content; but in the ranks no one thought of asking where or wherefore they were moving. If they indulged in regrets at the retreat, it was simply because they were compelled to leave pleasant quarters and the pretty Polish women. If it occurred to any one that affairs were going badly, then, as became a good soldier, the man who had such a thought would try to be jovial, and not think at all of the general course of events, but only of what nearest concerned himself.

At first, they were agreeably situated near Vilna, having jolly acquaintances among the Polish landed proprietors, and constantly expecting the sovereign, and other commanders highest in station, to review them, and as constantly being disappointed.

Then came the order to retire to Swienciany, and to destroy all provisions that they could not carry away with them. Swienciany was memorable to the hussars simply because it was the "drunken camp,"⁴ as the entire army called it, from their stay at the place, and because many complaints had been made of the troops having taken unfair advantage of the order to forage for provisions, and had included under this head horses and carriages and rugs stolen from the Polish pans, or nobles.

Rostof had a vivid remembrance of Swienciany, because on the first day of their arrival at the place he had dismissed a quartermaster, and had not been able to do anything with the men of his squadron, all of whom were tipsy, having, without his knowledge, brought away five barrels of old beer.

From Swienciany they had retired farther, and then farther still, until they reached the Drissa; and then they had retired from the Drissa, all the time approaching the Russian frontier.

On the 25th of July, the Pavlogradsui, for the first time, took part in a serious engagement.

On the 24th of July, the evening before the engagement, there was a severe thunder-storm, with rain and hail. That summer of the year 1812 was throughout remarkable for its thunder-showers.

¹Pyanui lager.

Two squadrons of the Pavlogradsui had bivouacked in a field of rye, already eared, but completely trampled down by the horses and cattle. It was raining in torrents, and Rostof, with a young officer named Ilyin, who was his protégé, was sitting under the shelter of a sort of wigwam, extemporized at short notice. An officer of their regiment, with long mustaches bristling forth and hiding his cheeks, came along, on his way from headquarters, and, being overtaken by the rain, asked shelter of Rostof.

"Count, I have just come from headquarters. Have you heard of Rayevsky's great exploit?"

And the officer proceeded to relate the particulars of the battle of Saltanovo, which he had learned about at headquarters.

Rostof, hunching his shoulders as the water trickled down his neck, lighted his pipe and listened negligently, now and then giving a look at the young officer Ilyin, who was squeezed in close to him. This officer, a lad of only sixteen, had not been very long connected with the regiment, and was now in the same relation to Rostof that Rostof had borne toward Denisof seven years before. Ilyin had taken Rostof as his pattern in every respect, and was in love with him like a woman.

The officer with the long mustaches, Zdrzhinsky by name, declared emphatically that the dike at Saltanovo was the Thermopylae of the Russians, and that the exploit performed by General Rayevsky was worthy of the deeds of antiquity. Zdrzhinsky described how Rayevsky went out on the dike, with his two sons, under a deadly fire, and, side by side with them, rushed to the attack.

Rostof listened to the story, and not only had nothing to say in response to the narrator's enthusiasm, but, on the contrary, had the air of a man ashamed of what is told him, although he has no intention of rebutting it.

Rostof, after the battle of Austerlitz, and the cam-campaign of 1807, knew, from his own personal experience, that those who talk of military deeds always lie; just as he himself had lied in relating such things. In the second place, his experience had taught him that, in a battle, every event is quite the reverse of what we might imagine and relate it. And, therefore, he took no stock in Zdrzhinsky’s story, and was not pleased with Zdrzhinsky himself, who, with his cheeks hidden by those long mustaches, had the habit of leaning over close to the face of the person to whom he was talking, and then, besides, was in the way in the narrow hut.

Rostof looked at him without speaking. “In the first place, there must have been such a crush and confusion on the dike which they were charging that even if Rayevsky had led his sons upon it, it could not have had any effect upon any one save perhaps a dozen men who were in his immediate vicinity,” thought Rostof. “The rest could not have seen at all how or with whom Rayevsky was rushing upon the dike. And then those who did see it could not have been very greatly stimulated, because what would they have cared for Rayevsky’s affectionate paternal feeling, when the only thing of interest to them was the caring for their own skin! Then again, the fate of the country in no wise depended on whether they took the dike at Saltanovo or not, as is supposed to have been the case at Thermopylae. And therefore what was the use of risking such a sacrifice? And, then, why should he have exposed his children in the affair? I should not have exposed my brother Petya to it, no, nor even this Ilyin here, though he is no relation to me,—but a good fellow all the same,—but I should have tried to put them safe out of harm’s way somewhere,” pursued Rostof, in his thoughts, all the while listening to Zdrzhinsky. But he did not speak his thoughts aloud; in regard to this also he had learned wisdom by experience. He knew that this story redounded to the glory of our arms, and therefore it was requisite to make believe that he had no doubt of it. And so he did.

“Well, there’s one thing, I can’t stand this,” exclaimed Ilyin, perceiving that Rostof was not pleased with Zdrzhinsky's chatter; "my stockings and my shirt are wet through, and it is running under me here. I am going in search of shelter. It seems to me the rain is not so heavy."

Ilyin went out and Zdrzhinsky mounted and rode off. At the end of five minutes Ilyin, slopping through the mud, came hurrying up to the wigwam.

"Hurrah! Rostof, come on quick! There's a tavern a couple of hundred paces from here, and a lot of our men are there already. We can get dry there, and Marie Heinrichovna is there too."

Marie Heinrichovna was the regimental doctor's wife, a pretty young German girl whom the doctor had married in Poland. Either because the doctor had no means, or because he did not wish to be separated from his bride during the early period of his married life, he took her wherever he went in his travels with the hussars, and his jealousy became a constant source of amusement and jest among the officers of the regiment.

Rostof flung his cloak over him, called Lavrushka to follow with the luggage, and went with Ilyin, plowing through the mud, plodding straight onward amid the now rapidly diminishing shower, into the darkness of the evening, occasionally interrupted by flashes of distant lightning.

"Rostof, where are you?"

"Here I am! what lightning!" was what they said as they marched along.

CHAPTER XIII

At the tavern, before which stood the doctor's kibitka, or traveling carriage, five officers were already gathered. Marie Heinrichovna, a plump, light-haired German, in jacket and nightcap, was sitting in the front room on a wide bench. Her spouse, the doctor, was asleep behind her. Rostof and Ilyin, welcomed by acclamations and roars of laughter, walked into the room.

"Ee! you have something very jolly going on," said Rostof, with a laugh.

"And what brings you here so late?"

"You are fine specimens! Look at the way they are streaming! Don't drown out our parlor floor!"

"Be careful how you daub Marie Heinrichovna's dress," cried the voices.

Rostof and Ilyin made haste to find a corner where, without shocking Marie Heinrichovna's modesty, they might change their wet garments. They had gone behind the partition to make the change, but the little room, which was scarcely more than a closet, was entirely filled by three officers, sitting on an empty chest, and playing cards by the light of a single candle; and nothing would induce them to evacuate the place.

Accordingly, Marie Heinrichovna surrendered her petticoat to them, and they hung it up in place of a screen; and behind this, Rostof and Ilyin, with Lavrushka's aid, who had brought their saddle-bags, exchanged their wet clothing for dry.

A fire had been started in a broken-down stove. They procured a board, laid it across a pair of saddles, covered it with a caparison; the samovar was set up, a bottle-case unpacked, and half a bottle of rum got out, and Marie Heinrichovna was requested to do the honors; all gathered around her. One offered her a clean handkerchief to wipe her lovely little hands; another spread his overcoat under her feet, to keep them from the dampness; a third hung his cloak in the window, to keep away the draught; a fourth waved the flies away from her husband's face, so that he would not wake up.

"Never mind him," said Marie Heinrichovna, smiling timidly and happily. "He always sleeps sound and well after he has been up all night."

"Oh, that is all right, Marie Heinrichovna!" exclaimed the officer. "We must take good care of the doctor. All things are possible; and he would have pity on me, if ever he came to saw off an arm or a leg for me."

There were only three glasses; the water was so muddy that it was impossible to tell whether the tea were too strong or too weak; and the samovarchik held only water enough for six glasses; but it was all the more fun to take turns, and to receive, in order of seniority, each his glass from Marie Heinrichovna's plump little hands, though her short nails were not perfectly clean!

All the officers seemed to be, and were, in love that evening with Marie Heinrichovna. Even the three who had been playing cards in the little room made haste to throw up their hands, and came out to the samovar, giving way to the common feeling of worship for Marie Heinrichovna's charms.

Marie Heinrichovna, seeing herself surrounded by these brilliant and courteous young men, fairly beamed with delight, in spite of all her efforts to hide it, and her manifest alarm every time her husband, on the bench back of her, moved in his sleep.

There was only one spoon, while there was a superfluity of sugar; but, as it was slow in melting, it was decided that she should stir each glass of tea in turn. Rostof, having received his glass and seasoned it with rum, asked Marie Heinrichovna to stir it for him.

"But you have n't put the sugar in, have you?" said she, constantly smiling, as if all that she said, and all that the others said, was as funny as it could be, and concealed some deep hidden meaning.

"No, I have n't any sugar yet; all it needs is for you to stir it with your little hand."

Marie Heinrichovna consented, and began to look for the spoon, which some one had meanwhile appropriated.

"Stir it with your dainty little finger, Marie Heinrichovna," said Rostof. "It will make it all the sweeter!"

"It's hot!" exclaimed Marie Heinrichovna, blushing with gratification.

Ilyin took a pail of water, and, throwing a little rum into it, came to Marie Heinrichovna, begging her to stir it with her finger.

"This is my cup," said he. "Just dip your finger in it, and I will drink it all up."

When the samovar had been entirely emptied, Rostof took a pack of cards, and proposed to play koroli\(^1\) with Marie Heinrichovna. Lots were cast as to who should be first to play with her.

At Rostof's suggestion, the game was so arranged that the one who became "king" should have the privilege of kissing Marie Heinrichovna's little hand; while he who came out prokhvost, or provost, as they called the loser, should have to start the samovar afresh for the doctor, when he awoke.

"Well, but supposing Marie Heinrichovna should be king?" asked Ilyin.

"She's our queen anyway. And her word shall be our law!"

The game had hardly begun, before the doctor's disheveled head appeared behind Marie Heinrichovna. He had been awake for some time, and had overheard all that had been said; and it was perfectly evident that he found nothing very jolly, amusing, or diverting in all that had been said and done. His face was glum and sour. He exchanged no greeting with the officers, but scratched his head, and asked them to make way, so that he could get out. As soon as he had left the room, all the officers burst into a roar of laughter, while Marie Heinrichovna blushed till the tears came, and thereby became all the more fascinating in the eyes of all those young men.

On his return from out-of-doors, the doctor told his wife, who had now ceased to smile that happy smile, and was looking at him in timid expectation of a scolding, that the storm had passed, and they must go and camp out in their kibitka, otherwise all their effects would be stolen.

\(^1\) Koroli, kings, is a South Russian game at cards, somewhat like the French games of écarté and triumphi. The winner is called korol, king, and can make the other pay a forfeit.
"But I will send a soldier to stand on guard — two of them," said Rostof. "What nonsense, doctor!"
"I'll stand guard myself," said Ilyin.
"No, gentlemen; you have had your rest, but I have not had any sleep for two nights," said the doctor, and sat down gloomily next his wife, to wait for the end of the game.

As they saw the doctor's lowering face bent angrily on his wife, the officers became more jovial still, and many of them could not refrain from bursts of merriment, plausible pretexts for which they kept striving to invent. When the doctor went out, taking his wife with him, and ensconced themselves in the snug little kibitka for the night, the officers wrapped themselves up in their damp cloaks and lay down anywhere in the tavern; but it was long before they could go to sleep, because of the talk that still went on; some of them recalling the doctor's jealous fear, and the doktorsha's jollity; while others went out on the steps, and came back to report what was going on in the kibitka.

Several times, Rostof, muffling up his ears, tried to go to sleep; but then some one would make a remark, and arouse his attention; and again the conversation would go on, and again they would break out into nonsensical, merry laughter, as if they were children.

CHAPTER XIV

It was three o'clock in the morning, and no one had caught a wink of sleep, when the quartermaster made his appearance with the orders to proceed to the little village of Ostrovno.

Still chattering and laughing as before, the officers made haste to get ready; they again set up the samovar, with the same dirty water. But Rostof, not waiting for tea, started off for his squadron.

It was already growing light, the rain had ceased, the clouds were scattering. It was damp and cold, especially in damp clothes. As they came out of the tavern, Rostof and Ilyin looked at the doctor's leathered kibitka, the leather cover of which, wet with the rain, gleamed in the early morning twilight, while the doctor's long legs protruded from under the apron; and, in the interior, among the cushions, the doktorsha's night-cap could be dimly seen, and her measured breathing heard, as she slept.

"Fact, she's very pretty!" said Rostof to Ilyin, who accompanied him.

"Yes, what a charming woman she is!" replied the other, with all the seriousness of sixteen.

Within half an hour, the squadron was drawn up on the road. The command was heard: "To saddle." The men crossed themselves, and proceeded to mount. Rostof, taking the lead, gave the command, "Marsch!" and, filing off four abreast, the hussars, with the sound of hoofs splashing in the pools, the clinking of sabers, and subdued conversation, started along the broad road, lined with birch trees, and following the infantry and artillery, which had gone on ahead.

Scattered purplish blue clouds, growing into crimson in the east, were swiftly fleeting before the wind. It was growing lighter and lighter. More distinguishable became the crisp grass which always grows on country cross-roads; it was still wet with the evening's rain. The pendulous foliage of the birches, also dripping with moisture, shook in the wind, and tossed aside the sparkling drops. Clearer and clearer grew the faces of the soldiers. Rostof rode along with Ilyin, who was his inseparable companion; they kept to one side of the road, which led between a double row of birches.

Rostof, during this campaign, had permitted himself to ride a Cossack horse, instead of his regular horse of the line. Being both a connoisseur and a huntsman, he had recently selected a strong, mettlesome, dun-colored pony, from the Don, which no one could think of matching in a race. It was a perfect delight for Rostof to ride on this steed. His thoughts now ran on horses, the beauty of the morning, the doctor's wife, and not once did he dream of danger being near.
In days gone by, Rostof, on approaching an engagement, would have felt a pang of dismay; now he experienced not the slightest sensation of timidity. He was devoid of all fear, not because he was wonted to fire—it is impossible to become wonted to danger—but rather because he had learned to control his heart in the presence of danger. On going into an engagement, he had accustomed himself to think about everything except the one thing which would have been most absorbing of all—the impending peril. In spite of all his efforts, in spite of all his self-reproaches for his cowardice, during the first term of his service, he had not been able to reach this point; but in the course of years it had come of itself. He rode now with Ilyin, side by side, between the birch trees, occasionally tearing off a leaf from a down-hanging branch, occasionally prodding the horse in the groin, occasionally, not even turning round, handing his exhausted pipe to the hussar just behind him, with such a calm and unconcerned appearance that one would have thought he was riding for pleasure.

He felt a pang of pity to look at Ilyin's excited face, as he rode along, talking fast and nervously. He knew from experience that painful state of mind at the expectation of danger and death which the young cornet was now experiencing, and he knew that nothing but time could cure him.

As soon as the sun came into sight, in the clear strip of sky below the clouds, the wind died down, as if it dared not mar in the slightest degree the perfect beauty of the summer morning after the storm; the raindrops were still falling, but now perpendicularly—and all was calm and still.

The sun came up, showed himself on the horizon, and then disappeared behind a long, narrow cloud. But, in the course of a few minutes, it burst forth brighter than ever on the upper edge of the cloud, cutting its edge.

The world was full of light and brilliancy. And simultaneously with this burst of light, and as if saluting it, pealed the reports of cannon toward the front.
Rostof had no time to calculate and decide how far distant these cannon-shots were, when an aide from Count Ostermann-Tolstoï came galloping up from Vitebsk, with the order to advance with all speed.

The squadron outstripped the infantry and artillery, which were also hurrying forward, plunged down a hill, and, dashing through a village deserted by its inhabitants, galloped up a slope at the other side. The horses were all of a lather, the men were flushed.

"Halt! Dress ranks," rang out the command of the division leader, at the front. "Guide left! Shagom marsch!" (that is, forward at a footpace) again rang the command. And the hussars rode along the line of the troops toward the left flank of the position, and drew rein just behind the Russian Uhlans, who were in the front rank. At the right stood the Russian infantry, in a solid mass; they were the reserves; higher up on the slope could be seen in the clear, clear atmosphere our cannon shining in the slanting rays of the bright morning sun, on the very horizon.

Forward, beyond a ravine, were heard our infantry, already involved in the action, and merrily exchanging shots with the enemy.

Rostof's heart beat high with joy, as he heard these sounds which he had not heard for many a long day, and now seemed like the notes of the jolliest music. Trap-ta-ta-tap, several shots cracked, sometimes together, suddenly, then rapidly, one after another.

The hussars stood for about an hour in one place. The cannonade had also begun. Count Ostermann and his suite came riding up behind the squadron, and, drawing rein, had a short conversation with the commander of the regiment, and then rode off toward the cannon at the height.

As soon as Ostermann rode away, the Uhlans heard the command: "In column: make ready to charge!"^1

The infantry in front of them parted their ranks to let the cavalry pass. The Uhlans started away, the pennons on their lances waving gayly, and down the slope they dashed at a trot, toward the French cavalry, which began to appear at the foot of the slope at the left.

^1 V kolonnu, k atakaye stroïsy!

As soon as the Uhlans started down the slope, the hussars were ordered to move forward and protect the battery on the height. While the hussars were stationed in the position before occupied by the Uhlans, bullets flew high over their heads, buzzing and humming through the air.

These sounds, which had not been heard by Rostof for long years, had a more pleasing and stimulating influence than the roar of musketry before. Straightening himself up in the saddle, he scrutinized the battle-field spread full before his eyes from the height where he was stationed, and his whole heart followed the Uhlans into the charge.

They had now flown almost down to the French dragoons; there was a collision in the smoke, and, at the end of five minutes, the Uhlans were being pressed back, not in the same place, indeed, but farther to the left. Mixed in with the orange-uniformed Uhlans, on their chestnut horses, and behind them, in a compact mass, could be seen the blue French dragoons, on their gray horses.

CHAPTER XV

Rostof, with his keen huntsman's eye, was one of the first to notice these French dragoons in blue pressing back our Uhlans. Nearer, nearer, in disorderly masses, came the Uhlans, and the French dragoons in pursuit of them.

Now all could see how these men, dwarfed by the distance, were jostling one another, driving one another, and brandishing their arms and their sabers.

Rostof looked down at what was going on, as if he were present at a hunt. His instinct told him that, if the hussars could now add their impetus to that of the Uhlans, the French dragoons could not stand it; but if the blow was to be struck, it was to be done immediately, on the instant, else it would be too late. He glanced around; a captain stationed near him had likewise his eyes fixed steadfastly on the cavalry contest below.

"Andrei Sevastyanuitch!" said Rostof. "See, we might crush them."....

"'T would be a dashing piece of work," said the captain, "but still ...."

Rostof, not waiting to hear his answer, gave spurs to his horse, dashed along in front of his squadron, and, before he had even given the word for the advance, the whole squadron to a man, experiencing exactly what he had, scoured after him.

Rostof himself did not know how and why he did this thing. The whole action was as instinctive, as unpremeditated, as if he had been out hunting. He saw that the dragoons were near at hand, that they were galloping forward in disorderly ranks. He knew that they would not withstand a sudden attack; he knew that it was the matter of a single moment, which would not return if he let it have the go-by. The bullets whizzed and whistled around him so stimulatingly, his horse dashed on ahead so hotly, that he could not but yield. He plunged the spurs still deeper into his horse's side, shouted his command, and, at that same instant, hearing behind him the hoof-clatter of his squadron, breaking into the charge, at full trot, he gave his horse his head down the hill, at the dragoons. No sooner had they reached the bottom of the slope than their gait changed involuntarily from trot to gallop, growing ever swifter and swifter in proportion as they approached the Uhlans and the French dragoons who were driving them back.

The dragoons were close to them. The foremost, seeing the hussars, started to turn; those in the rear paused. Feeling as if he were galloping to cut off an escaping wolf, Rostof, urging his Don pony to his utmost, dashed on toward the disconcerted French dragoons. One of the Uhlans reined in his horse; one, who had been dismounted, threw himself on the ground to escape being crushed; a riderless steed dashed in among the hussars. Almost all the French dragoons were now in full retreat.

Rostof, selecting one of them, mounted on a gray steed, started in pursuit of him. On the way, he found himself rushing at a bush; his good steed, without hesitating, took it at a leap; and, almost before Rostof had settled himself in his saddle again, he saw that he should within a few seconds have overtaken the man whom he had selected as his objective point. This Frenchman, evidently an officer by his uniform, bending forward, was urging on his gray horse, striking him with his saber. A second later Rostof's horse hit the other's rear with his chest, almost knocking him over; and, at the same instant, Rostof, not knowing why, raised his saber and struck at the Frenchman.

The instant he did so all Rostof's excitement suddenly vanished. The officer fell, not so much from the effect of the saber-stroke, which had only scratched him slightly above the elbow, as it was from the collision of the horses and from panic. Rostof pulled up to look for his enemy, and see whom he had vanquished. The French officer of dragoons was hopping along, with one foot on the ground and the other entangled in the stirrup. With his eyes squinting with fear, as if he expected each instant to be struck down again, he was looking up at Rostof with an expression of horror. His pale face, covered with mud, fair and young, with dimpled chin and bright blue eyes, was not made for the battle-field—not the face of an enemy, but a simple home face.

Even before Rostof had made up his mind what to do with him, the officer cried: "Je me rends." In spite of all his efforts, he could not extricate his foot from the stirrup; and still, with frightened blue eyes, he kept gazing at Rostof. Some of the hussars, who had come galloping up, freed his foot for him, and helped him to mount. The hussars were coming back in all directions with dragoons as prisoners: one was wounded, but, with his face all covered with blood, would not surrender his horse; another was seated on the crupper of a hussar's horse, with his arm around the man's waist; a third, assisted by a hussar, was clambering up on the horse's back.

In front the French infantry were in full retreat, firing as they went.

The hussars swiftly returned to their position with their prisoners. Rostof spurred back with the rest, a prey to a peculiarly disagreeable feeling which oppressed his heart. A certain vague perplexity, which he found it utterly impossible to account for, overcame him at the capture of that young officer and the blow which he had given him.

Count Ostermann-Tolstoi met the hussars on their return, summoned Rostof, and thanked him, saying that he should report to the sovereign his gallant exploit and recommend him for the cross of the George. When the summons to Count Ostermann came, Rostof remembered that the charge had been made without orders; and he was therefore fully persuaded that the commander called for him to punish him for his presumptuous action. Consequently Ostermann's flattering words and his promise of a reward ought to have been all the more agreeable to Rostof; but that same vague, disagreeable feeling still tortured his mind.

"What can it be that troubles me so, I wonder?" he asked himself, as he rode away from the interview. "Ilyin? No, he is safe and sound. Have I anything to be ashamed of? No, nothing of the sort at all."—It was an entirely different feeling, like remorse.—"Yes, yes, that French officer with the dimple. And how distinctly I remember hesitating before I raised my arm."

Rostof saw the prisoners about to be conducted away, and he galloped up to them, in order to have another look at the officer with the dimpled chin. He was sitting, in his foreign uniform, on a hussar's stallion, and was glancing around uneasily. The wound on his arm was scarcely deserving of the name. He gave Rostof a hypocritical smile, and waved his hand at him, as a sort of salute. Rostof had still the same feeling of awkwardness, and something seemed to weigh on his conscience.

All that day, and the day following, Rostof's friends and comrades noticed that he was—not exactly gloomy or surly, but taciturn, thoughtful, and concentrated. He drank, as it were, under protest, tried to be alone, and evidently had something on his mind.

Rostof was, all the time, thinking about his brilliant exploit, which, much to his amazement, had given him the cross of the George, and had even given him the reputation of being a hero; and he found it utterly incomprehensible.

"And so they are still more afraid of us than we are of them!" he said to himself. "Is this all there is of what is called heroism? Did I do that for my country's sake? And wherein was he to blame, with his dimple and his blue eyes? And how frightened he was! He thought I was going to kill him! My hand trembled; but still they have given me the Georgievsky cross. I don't understand it at all, not at all!"

But while Nikolai was working over these questions in his own mind, and still failed to find any adequate solution of what was so confusing to him, the wheel of fortune, as so often happens in the military service, had been given a turn in his favor. He was promoted after the engagement at Ostrovno, and given command of a battalion of hussars; and where there was any necessity of employing a brave officer, he was given the chance.

CHAPTER XVI

On learning of Natasha's illness, the countess, still not very well, and weak, went to Moscow, taking Petya and the whole household; and all the Rostofs left Marya Dmitrievna's, and went to their own house, and took up their residence in the city.

Natasha's illness was so serious that, fortunately for her happiness, and for the happiness of her relatives, the thought of all that had been the cause of her illness, her misconduct, and the breach with her betrothed, were relegated to the background. She was so ill that it was impossible to take up the consideration of how far she had been blameworthy in the matter; for she had no appetite, and she could not sleep, she lost flesh, and had a cough, and her condition was critical, as the doctors gave them to understand.

There was nothing else to be thought of than to give her all the aid they could devise: the doctors came to see her, both singly and in consultation; talked a great deal in French, in German, and in Latin; criticized one another; prescribed the most varied remedies adapted to cure all the diseases known to their science; but it did not occur to one of them, simple as it might seem, that the disease from which Natasha was suffering might be unknown to them, just as every ailment which attacks mortal man is beyond their power of understanding: since each mortal man has his own distinguishing characteristics, and whatever disease he has must, necessarily, be peculiar and new, complicated and unknown to medicine; not a disease of the lungs, of the liver, of the skin, of the heart, of the nerves, and so on, as described in works on medicine, but an ailment produced from any one of endless combinations of these organs in disease.

This simple idea could not occur to the doctors (any more than it could ever occur to a warlock that his incantations were useless), because it is their life-work to practise medicine, because it is their way of earning money, and because they spend the best years of their lives at this business.

But the chief reason why this thought could not occur to the doctors was because they saw that they were unquestionably of service; and, in deed and truth, they were of service to all the Rostof household. They were of service, not because they made the sick girl swallow drugs, for the most part harmful, — though the harmfulness was of little moment, because the noxious drugs were given in small quantities, — but they were of service, they were needful, they were indispensable — and this is the reason that there are, and always will be, alleged "curers," — quacks, homeopaths and allopaths, — because they satisfied the moral demands of the sick girl and those who loved her. They satisfied that eternal human demand for hope and consolation, that demand for sympathy and activity, which a man experiences at a time of suffering.

They satisfied that eternal human demand — noticeable in a child in its simplest and most primitive form — to have the bruised place rubbed. A child tumbles, and immediately runs to its mother or its nurse to be kissed, and have the sore place rubbed, and its pains are alleviated as soon as the sore place is rubbed or kissed. The child cannot help believing that those who are stronger and wiser than he must have the means of giving him aid for his sufferings. And this hope of alleviation and expression of sympathy at the time when the mother rubs the bump are a comfort.

The doctors in Natasha's case were of service, because they kissed and rubbed the bobo, assuring her that it would go away if the coachman would only hurry down to the Arbatskaya apothecary shop and get a ruble and seventy kopeks' worth of powders and pellets in a neat little box, and if the sick girl would take these powders, dissolved in boiling water, regularly every two hours, neither more nor less.

What would Sonya and the count and the countess have done if they had looked on without taking any part; if there had been no little pellets every two hours, no warm drinks, no chicken cutlets to prepare, and none of all those little necessary things prescribed by the doctor, the observance of which gave occupation and consolation to the friends?

How would the count have borne his beloved daughter's illness if he had not known that it was going to cost him some thousands of rubles, and that he would not grudge thousands more to do her any good; if he had not known that in case she did not recover speedily, he should not grudge still other thousands in taking her abroad, and then going to the expense of consultations; if he had not been able to tell in all its details how Métivier and Feller had not understood the case, while Friese had, and Mudrof had still more successfully, diagnosed the disease?

What would the countess have done if she could not have occasionally scolded Natasha because she did not fully conform to the doctor's orders?

"You will never get well," she would say, forgetting her anxiety in her vexation, "if you don't obey the doctor, and if you don't take your medicine regularly. You must not treat it lightly, because, if you do, it may go into pneumonia," the countess would say; and she found great consolation in repeating this one word, which was something incomprehensible for her and others besides.

What would Sonya have done if she had not had the joyful consciousness that, during the first part of the time, she had not undressed for three nights, so that she might be ready to carry out to the least detail all the doctor's prescriptions; and that even now she lay awake all night, lest she should sleep over the hours when it was necessary to administer the not very hurtful pellets from the little gilt box?

Even Natasha herself, who, although she declared that no medicine could cure her, and that all this was nonsense, could not help a feeling of gratification that it was for her they were making so many sacrifices, that it was she who had to take the medicine at the hours prescribed. And likewise she felt glad that by her neglect to carry out the doctor's orders she might show that she did not believe in medicine, and did not value her life.

The doctor came every day, felt of her pulse, looked at her tongue, and, paying no attention to her dejected face, laughed and joked with her. But afterward, when he had gone into the next room, and the countess had hastily followed him, he would pull a serious face and shake his head dubiously, saying that, though the patient was in a critical state, still he had good hopes for the efficacy of the last medicine he had prescribed, and that they must wait and see; that the ailment was more mental, but ....

The countess, who had tried as far as possible to shut her own eyes, and the doctor's, to Natasha's behaviour, thrust the gold piece into his hand, and each time, with a relieved heart, went back to her invalid.

The symptoms of Natasha's illness were loss of appetite, sleeplessness, a cough, and a constant state of apathy. The doctors declared that it was impossible for her to dispense with medical treatment, and, consequently, she was kept a prisoner in the sultry air of the city. And, during the summer of 1812, the Rostofs did not go to their country place.

In spite of the immense quantity of pellets, drops, and powders swallowed by Natasha, out of glass jars and gilt boxes, of which Madame Schoss, who was a great lover of such things, had made a large collection; in spite of being deprived of her customary life in the country,—youth at last got the upper hand: Natasha's sorrow began to disappear under the impressions of every-day life; it ceased to lie so painfully on her heart, it began to appear past and distant, and Natasha's physical health showed signs of improvement.

CHAPTER XVII

Natasha was more calm, but not more cheerful. She not only avoided all the external scenes of gayety,—balls, driving, concerts, the theater; but, even when she laughed, it seemed as if the tears were audible back of her laughter. She could not sing. As soon as she started to laugh, or essayed, when all alone by herself, to sing, the tears choked her: tears of repentance, tears of remembrance, of regret, of the irrevocable happy days; tears of vexation that she had thus idly wasted her young life, which might have been so happy. Laughter and song especially seemed to her like mockery of her sorrow.
She never once thought of coquetry; it did not even occur to her to refrain from it. She declared, and she felt, that at this time all men were for her no more than the buffoon Nastasya Ivanovna. An inward monitor strenuously interdicted every kind of pleasure. Moreover, she showed no interest, as of old, in that girlish round of existence, so free of care and full of hope. She recalled more frequently, and with keener pain than aught else, those autumn months with the hunting and the “little uncle,” and the holidays with Nikolai at Otradnoye. What would she not have given for the return of even a single day of that vanished time! But it was past forever! She had not been mistaken in the presentiment she had felt then that that condition of careless freedom and susceptibility to every pleasant influence would never more return. But to live was a necessity.

It was a consolation for her to think, not that she was better, as she had formerly thought, but that she was worse, vastly worse, than any one else in the world. But this was a little thing. She knew it, and asked herself: “What more is there?” But there was nothing more in store for her. There was no further joy in life; and yet life went on. Natasha’s sole endeavor evidently was that she might not be a burden to any one, and not to interfere with any one, while, for her own personal gratification, she asked for nothing at all. She kept aloof from the other members of the household, and only with her brother Petya did she feel at all at ease. She liked to be with him more than with the others, and sometimes, when they were alone together, she would laugh. She scarcely ever went out of the house; and, of those who came to call, there was only one man whom she was glad to see, and that was Pierre.

It could not have been possible for any one to have shown more tenderness and discretion, and, at the same time, more seriousness, in his treatment of her, than did Count Bezukhōt. Natasha unconsciously felt the spell of this affectionate tenderness, and, accordingly, she took great delight in his society. But she was not even thankful to him for his kindness. Pierre's goodness seemed to her spontaneous. It seemed to her that it was so perfectly natural for Pierre to be kind to everyone, that he deserved no credit for his goodness. Sometimes Natasha noticed his confusion and awkwardness in her presence, especially when he was desirous of doing her some favor, or when he was apprehensive lest something in their talk might suggest disagreeable recollections. She noticed this, and ascribed it to his natural kindness and shyness, which, in her opinion, as far as she knew, must be shown to all, just as it was to her.

Since those ambiguous words, "if he were free, he should, on his knees, sue for her heart and her hand," spoken at a moment of such painful excitement on her part, Pierre had never made any allusion whatever to his feelings for Natasha; and, as far as she was concerned, it was evident that those words, so consoling to her at the time, had had no more meaning to her than most thoughtless, unconsidered words, spoken for the consolation of a weeping child. It never entered her head that her relations with Pierre might lead to love on her side—much less on his—or even to that form of tender, self-acknowledged, poetic friendship between a man and a woman, of which she had known several examples; and this, not because Pierre was a married man, but because Natasha was conscious that between him and her, in all its reality, existed that barrier of moral obstacles, the absence of which she had been conscious of in Kuragin.

Toward the end of the midsummer's fast of Saint Peter, Agrafena Ivanovna Bielova, one of the Rostofs' neighbors at Otradnoye, came to Moscow to worship at the shrines of the saints there. She proposed to Natasha to join in her devotions, and Natasha gladly entertained the suggestion. Notwithstanding the doctor's prohibition of her going out early in the morning, Natasha insisted on preparing for the sacrament, and doing so, not as it was usually managed at the Rostofs', by listening to three services in the house, but rather to prepare for it as Agrafena Ivanovna did, that is, taking the whole week, without missing a single vespers, mass, or matins.

1Saint Peter's day is June 29 (O.S.), July 11 (N.S.).

The countess was pleased with this zeal of Natasha's. After all the failure of medical treatment, she hoped in her heart that prayer might prove to be a more powerful medicament; and, though she did it with some apprehension, and concealed it from the knowledge of the doctor, she yielded to Natasha's desire, and let her go with Madame Bielova.

Agrafena Ivanovna came at three o'clock in the morning to arouse Natasha; and yet generally she found her already wide awake. Natasha was afraid of sleeping over the hour of matins. Making hasty ablutions, and humbly dressing in her shabbiest gown and an old mantle, shivering with the chill of morning, Natasha would venture out into the empty streets, dimly lighted by the diaphanous light of early dawn.

In accordance with the pious Agrafena Ivanovna's advice, Natasha performed her devotions not in her own parish, but at a church where, according to her, there was a priest of very austere and lofty life. At this church there were always very few people. Natasha would take her usual place with Madame Bielova before the icon of the Mother of God, enshrined at the back of the choir, at the left; and a new feeling of calmness would come over her before the vast and incomprehensible mystery, when, at that unprecedentedly early hour of the morning, she gazed at the darkened face of the Virgin's picture, lighted by the tapers burning before it, as well as by the morning light that came in through the windows, as she listened to the sounds of the service, which she tried to follow understandingly.

When she understood it, her personal feeling entered into and tinged the meaning of the prayer; but when she could not understand it, it was all the more delicious for her to think that the very desire to comprehend everything was in itself a form of pride, that it is impossible to comprehend everything, and that all that is requisite and necessary is to have faith and trust in God, who at that moment, she was conscious, reigned in her heart. She would cross herself and bow low; and when the service was too deep for her comprehension, then only, horror-stricken at her own baseness, she would beseech God to pardon her for everything, for everything, and have mercy upon her.

The prayers which she followed with the most fervor were those expressing remorse. Returning home in the early hours of the morning, when the only men she met were masons going to their work, and dvorniks sweeping the streets, and every one in all the houses was still asleep, Natasha experienced a new sense of the possibility of being purged of her sins, and the possibility of a new, pure life and happiness.

During all that week, while she was leading this life, this feeling grew stronger every day. And the happy thought of taking the communion—or, as Agrafena, playing on the word, called it, the communication⁠—seemed to her so majestic that it seemed to her she should never live till that blessed Sunday.

But the happy day came, and when Natasha, on this memorable Sunday, returned home in her white muslin dress, from communion, she, for the first time after many months, felt tranquil and not burdened by the thought of living.

When the doctor came that day to see Natasha, he ordered her to continue taking the last prescription of powders which he had prescribed a fortnight before.

"Don't fail to take them morning and evening," said he, evidently feeling honestly satisfied and even elated at the success of his treatment. "Only be more regular, please. .... Rest quite easy, countess," said the doctor, in a jovial tone, skilfully clutching the gold piece in his plump hands. "She will soon be singing and enjoying herself. The last medicine has been very, very efficacious. She has already gained very noticeably."

The countess looked at her finger-nails, and spat as she returned to the drawing-room with a radiant face.

1 Soobshchitsa, instead of priobshchitsa. 2 For the omen's sake.
CHAPTER XVIII

During the first weeks of July, more and more disquieting rumors about the progress of the war began to be circulated in Moscow: people talked about the sovereign's appeal to his people, and about the sovereign's leaving the army and coming to Moscow. And as the manifesto and summons were not received in Moscow until the twenty-third of July, exaggerated reports about them and about the position of Russia were current. It was said that the sovereign was coming because the army was in a critical position; it was said that Smolensk had surrendered, that Napoleon had a million men, and that only a miracle could save Russia.

The manifesto was received on the twenty-third of July, on a Saturday, but as yet it had not been published; and Pierre, who was at the Rostofs', promised to come to dinner the next day, Sunday, and bring the manifesto and the proclamation, which he would get of Count Rostopchin.

On that Sunday the Rostofs, as usual, went to mass at the private chapel of the Razumovskys. It was a sultry July day. Even at ten o'clock, when the Rostofs' carriage drew up in front of the church, the heated atmosphere, the shouts of peddlers, the bright, light-colored, summer gowns of the ladies, the dust-covered leaves of the trees along the boulevard, the sounds of music, and the white trousers of a regiment marching by on its way to parade, the rattle of carriages over the pavement, and the dazzling radiance of the hot sun, gave the impression of that summer languor, that content, as well as discontent, with the present which is always felt with especial keenness on a bright, sultry day in the city.

In the chapel of the Razumovskys were gathered all the élite of Moscow, all the acquaintances of the Rostofs—for that year, as if something unusual were about to happen, very many of the wealthy families who usually went off to their country estates had remained in town.
Natasha, as she walked in with her mother, preceded by a liveried lackey, who cleared a way through the throng, overheard a young man making a remark about her in an overloud whisper.

"That is the Rostova . . . the very one!"

"How thin she has grown! but still she is pretty.

She heard or thought she heard the names of Kuragin and Bolkonsky mentioned. However, it often seemed to her so. It always seemed to her that all who looked at her were thinking only of what had happened to her.

With pain and sinking at heart, as always in a throng, Natasha walked on in her lilac silk dress trimmed with black lace, and giving the appearance, as women can do, of being calm and dignified, for the very reason that her heart was full of pain and shame. She knew that she was pretty, and she was not mistaken; but the knowledge did not now give her the same pleasure as before. On the contrary, it annoyed her above everything of late, and especially on that bright, hot summer day in the city.

"Still another Sunday, still another week gone," she said to herself, as she remembered for what purpose she was there that day. "And forever the same life that is not life, and the same conditions in which it used to be so easy to live in days gone by. I am pretty, I am young, and I know that now I am good whereas before I was naughty; but now I am good, I know," she said to herself; "but it's all for nothing, that the best, best years of my life have gone and are going."

She took her place with her mother, and exchanged greetings with the acquaintances around her. Out of old habit she noticed the toilets of the ladies; she criticized the tenue of one lady who happened to be standing near her, and the indecorous manner in which she held her hand as she crossed herself; again she thought with vexation that the others were probably criticizing her just as she was criticizing them, and suddenly, as she heard the sounds of the service, she was horror-struck at her depravity, she was horror-struck because her newly acquired purity was again sullied.
A beautiful-looking, clean, little old man officiated with that sweet solemnity which has such a majestic and sanctifying influence upon the hearts of worshipers. The "Holy Gate"¹ was closed, the curtain was slowly drawn, a mysterious, solemn voice on the other side murmured undistinguishable words. Natasha's bosom heaved with tears too deep for comprehension, and she was agitated by a feeling of joy and tormenting pain.

"Teach me what I must do, how to direct my life, how to do right always, always...." she prayed in her heart.

The deacon came out to the ambon, used his thumb to pull his long hair out from under his surplice, and, pressing his cross to his heart, began to read in a loud and solemn voice the words of the prayer.

"Let all the people pray unto the Lord!"

"Let all the people, all united, without distinctions of rank, without enmity, but joined together in brotherly love.... let us all pray," was Natasha's thought.

"For the world to come and the salvation of our souls!"

"For the world of the angels and the spirits of all incorporeal existences, which dwell above us," prayed Natasha.

During the prayer for the army, she remembered her brother and Denisof.

During the prayer for those who were traveling on sea or on land, she thought of Prince Andrei, and prayed for him, and prayed that God would pardon the wrong that she had done him.

During the prayer for those who love us, she prayed for those of her household—her father, her mother, Sonya; and now, for the first time, she realized all the wrong that she had done them, and felt how deep and strong was her love toward them.

When the prayer for those who hate us was read, she tried to think of her enemies, and those who hated her, in order to pray for them. Among her enemies she reckoned her father’s creditors, and all those who had dealings with him, and every time, at the thoughts of her enemies and those who hated her, she remembered Anatol, who had done her such injury, and, although he had not hated her, she prayed gladly for him as for an enemy.

¹ Tsarskiya dveri.

Only during the prayer was she able to think calmly and clearly about Prince Andrei and about Anatol, as about men toward whom her feelings had been entirely swallowed up in her fear and worship of God.

When the prayer was read for the imperial family, and for the Synod, she made a very low bow and crossed herself, with the thought that if she could not understand, she at least could not doubt, and consequently must love, the directing Synod, and pray for it.

Having finished the liturgy,¹ the deacon crossed himself on the front of his stole, and exclaimed:—

"Let us give ourselves and our bodies to Christ our God."

"Let us give ourselves to God," repeated Natasha, in her own heart. "My God, I give myself up to Thy will," said she to herself. "I have no wishes, I have no desires! Teach me what to do, how to fulfil Thy will! Yea, take me, take me!" cried Natasha, in her heart, with touching impatience, forgetting to cross herself, but letting her slender arms drop by her side, and as if expecting that instantly some viewless Power would take her and free her from herself, from her sorrows, desires, shortcomings, hopes, and faults.

The countess many times during the service glanced at her daughter’s pathetic face and glistening eyes, and besought God to give her His aid.

Unexpectedly, in the middle of the service, and out of the usual order of things, which Natasha knew so well, a diachok brought out the wooden stool on which the priest kneels when he reads the prayers on Trinity Sunday, and placed it in front of the "Holy Gates."

The priest came forth in his lilac velvet calotte,

¹ The yekteniya, or liturgical prayer for the imperial family.
smoothed his hair down, and with some effort got down on his knees.

All followed his example, looking with perplexity at one another. It was the prayer which had only just been received from the Synod, the prayer for the salvation of Russia from the invasion of her enemies.

"Lord God our strength! God our salvation!" began the priest, in that clear, undemonstrative, sweet voice, which the Slavonic clergy only use in their reading, and which has such an irresistible effect on the Russian heart.

"Lord God of Hosts! God our salvation! Protect this day in Thy infinite mercy and bounty Thy humble people, and charitably hear us and spare us and have mercy upon us. The enemy are bringing destruction upon Thy land, and would fain make the universe a wilderness. Rise Thou up against him. This lawless multitude have gathered themselves together to destroy Thine inheritance, to lay waste Thy holy Jerusalem, Thy beloved Russia; to desecrate Thy temples, to overturn Thine altars, and to profane our sanctuary. How long, O Lord, how long shall sinners triumph? How long shall they be permitted to transgress Thy laws?

"Sovereign Lord! hear Thou us that cry unto Thee! By Thy might strengthen Thou our most devout autocrat and ruler, our great sovereign the Emperor Alexander Pavlovitch! remember his equity and meekness! Requite him for his virtues, and let them be the safeguard of us. Thy beloved Israel. Bless his counsels, his undertakings, and his deeds. Establish by Thine almighty right hand his realm, and grant him victory over his enemies, as Thou didst to Moses over Amalek, Gideon over Midian, and David over Goliath. Protect Thou his armies. Place the brazen bow in the arms of those who have gone forth to battle in Thy name, and gird them with strength for the war. Take Thy sword and Thy buckler, and arise and help us, and put to shame and confusion those that have plotted evil against us, so that they may fly before the faces of those that trust in Thee as chaff is driven before the wind, and may Thy mighty Angel confound them and pursue them. May the net come upon them without their knowing it, and may the draught of fish which they meant to take surround them on all sides, and may they fall under the feet of Thy slaves, and may they be trampled under the feet of our warriors! O Lord! Thou art able to save in great things and in small. Thou art God and no man can do aught against Thee.

"God of our fathers! Let Thy bounty and Thy mercy guard us from everlasting to everlasting. Hide not Thy face from us; let not Thy wrath be kindled against our iniquities; but in the magnitude of Thy mercy and the abundance of Thy grace pardon our lawlessness and our sin. Create a clean heart within us, and renew a right spirit in our inner parts; strengthen Thou our faith in Thee; inspire hope; kindle true love among us; arm us with a single impulse to the righteous defense of the inheritance which Thou hast given to us and to our fathers, and let not the scepter of the ungodly decide the destiny of those whom Thou hast consecrated.

"O Lord, our God, in Thee do we put our trust, and our hopes are set on Thee. Let us not despair of Thy mercy, and give a sign, in order that those who hate us and our Orthodox Faith may be confounded and destroyed, and that all nations may see that Thy name is the Lord, and we are Thy people. Show us Thy mercy, O Lord, this day, and vouchsafe to us Thy salvation. Rejoice the heart of Thy slaves by Thy grace; strike our enemies, and crush them under the feet of those that believe in Thee. For Thou art the defense, the succor, and the victory to them that trust in Thee, and to Thee be the glory—to the Father and to the Son and to the Holy Spirit, as it was in the beginning, is now, and ever shall be, world without end. Amen."

In that condition of spiritual excitement to which Natasha had attained, this prayer had a very powerful effect upon her. She listened to every word about "the victory of Moses over Amalek, of Gideon over Midian, and David over Goliath, and the laying waste of Thy Jerusalem," and she prayed to God with that tenderness of spirit and melting of the heart which she now felt. But she did not understand very well what she should pray God for. With all her heart she could join in the petition for a right spirit, for fortifying zeal with faith and hope, and stimulating their love.

But she could not pray that the enemy might be crushed under their feet, because only a few moments before her only regret was that she had no more of them, so that she might pray for them.

But at the same time she could not doubt the rightfulness of the prayer which the kneeling priest had read. She felt in her heart a genuine and anxious terror at the thought of the punishment which must befall men on account of their sins, and especially for her own sins, and she besought God to forgive them all, and her as well, and to give them all and her tranquillity and happiness in life.

And it seemed to her that God heard her prayer.

1 The effect of this prayer is enhanced in the original by the dignified Slavonic, the Church language, in which it is couched.
CHAPTER XIX

From the day when Pierre, as he left the Rostofs' with Natasha's look of gratitude still fresh in his mind, and gazed at the comet stretched across the sky, and felt that he had made a new discovery, the eternally tormenting question as to the vanity and folly of all things earthly had ceased to occupy his thoughts. This terrible question, Why? Wherefore? which before had come up before him amid every occupation, had now merged itself for him, not into another problem, and not into any answer to his question, but into her image.

Whether he listened or took the lead himself in trivial conversations, whether he read or heard about the baseness and absurdity of men, he no longer felt that sense of horror as before; he did not ask himself what caused men to struggle so, when life was so short and incomprehensible, but he recalled how she looked when he saw her the last time, and all his doubts vanished, not because she had given the answer to his questions, but because her image instantly lifted him into another realm, serene and full of spiritual activity, where there could be no question of right or wrong—the realm of beauty and love which alone makes life worth living. Whatever baseness in life might be brought to his attention, he would say to himself:

"Well, then, let N. N. plunder the government and the Tsar, and let the government and the Tsar load him with honors; but she smiled on me last evening, and asked me to come again, and I love her, and no one shall ever know it!"

And his soul became calm and clear.

Pierre continued as before to go into gay society, and drank heavily, and led the same idle and dissipated life, for the reason that at such times as he was not able to spend at the Rostofs' there were still many hours every day which he had to spend in some manner, and his habits and acquaintances at Moscow invariably allured... him to this mode of existence, which had such a firm hold upon him.

But of late, now that the news from the theater of the war became constantly more and more disquieting, and now that Natasha's health had fairly begun to improve, and she ceased to arouse in him that former feeling of anxiety and pity, he began to become the prey of a restlessness which grew more and more incomprehensible. He was conscious that the position in which he found himself could not last very long, that some catastrophe was at hand, which was destined to change his whole life, and he impatiently sought to find in everything the presages of this imminent catastrophe.

One of the brotherhood of Freemasons had called his attention to the following prophecy concerning Napoleon. It was derived from the Revelation of Saint John. In the eighteenth verse of the thirteenth chapter of the Apocalypse it is written: "Here is wisdom. He that hath understanding, let him count the number of the beast; for it is the number of a man: and his number is six hundred and sixty and six." And the fifth verse of the same chapter says: "And there was given unto him a mouth speaking great things and blasphemies. And there was given unto him authority to do his works during forty and two months."

The letters of the French alphabet when disposed in accordance with the Hebrew enumeration, which gives the first nine letters the value of units, and the rest that of tens, have the following significance:

\[
\begin{align*}
\text{a} &= 1, \text{b} &= 2, \text{c} &= 3, \text{d} &= 4, \text{e} &= 5, \text{f} &= 6, \\
\text{g} &= 7, \text{h} &= 8, \text{i} &= 9, \text{j} &= 10, \text{k} &= 20, \text{l} &= 30, \\
\text{m} &= 40, \text{n} &= 50, \text{o} &= 60, \text{p} &= 70, \text{q} &= 80, \text{r} &= 90, \\
\text{s} &= 100, \text{t} &= 110, \text{u} &= 120, \text{v} &= 130, \text{w} &= 140, \text{x} &= 150, \text{y} &= 160 \end{align*}
\]

If the words l'Empereur Napoléon are written letter for letter with this cipher, the result is that the sum of these letters amounts to six hundred and sixty-six; therefore Napoleon is the beast described in the Apocalypse. Moreover, if you apply to this same alphabetic cipher the words Quarante deux, that is the time, forty-two months, during which authority was given to the beast to speak great things and blaspheme, the sum of these letters according to the same scheme will amount to six hundred and sixty-six, whence it results that Napoleon's power was to be allowed to last until the year 1812, when he would have reached the age of forty-two.

Pierre was greatly amazed by this method of divination, and he frequently asked himself what could possibly put an end to the power of the beast, that is to say, Napoleon; and he made use of the same cipher and mode of reckoning, in order to find an answer to the question that he had propounded. Thus he wrote, as an experiment, l'Empereur Alexandre, and La nation russe, but the sum of the letters came out either greater or less than six hundred and sixty-six.

One time, while occupying himself with this enumeration, he wrote his own name, Comte Pierre Besouhoff; 1 the sum of the figures did not agree. Then changing the spelling, substituting z for s, he added the "particule" de, he added the article le, and still he failed to attain the desired result.

Then it occurred to him that if the answer desired for the question was included in his name, it would certainly have also to include his nationality. He wrote Le Russe Besuhof, and, reckoning up the figures, he made six hundred and seventy-one. Only five too much! Five corresponds to e, the very same e which was elided in the article before the word "Empereur." Eliding this e, though it was contrary to the rule, Pierre found the wished-for answer, l'Russe Besuhof, equal to six hundred and sixty-six.

This discovery excited him. How, by what bond, he was united to this mighty event foreshadowed in the Apocalypse he knew not; but not for an instant did he have any doubt of the bond. His love for Natasha, the Antichrist, Napoleon's invasion, the comet, six hundred and sixty-six, l'Empereur Napoléon, and l'Russe Besuhof, —all taken together, could not fail to ripen and burst and bring him forth from that enchanted, do-nothing world of Moscovite habits, in which he felt himself a prisoner, and carry him to some mighty exploit and some mighty happiness.

1 In the course of "War and Peace," Pierre's family name appears under at least three different forms of spelling: Bezukhoi, — which in this translation is retained throughout,—Bezukhi, and Bezukhof; the Russian character kh corresponds to ch in German, and is often represented in French by h. It may be here remarked, also, à propos of the "particule" de, that the French and German way of representing titled Russians' names with a de or a von is incorrect; the Russian nobility is dependent on neither titles nor "particules."

Pierre, on the evening before the Sunday when the prayer was read, had promised the Rostofs to bring them from Count Rostopchin, with whom he was on terms of intimacy, the proclamation to the Russians and the last news from the army. That morning, on his arrival at Count Rostopchin's, Pierre found a courier, who had just come from the army. This courier was an acquaintance of Pierre's, a regular attendant of Moscow ball-rooms.

"For God's sake, could n't you help me out?" asked the courier. "I have a whole bagful of letters for friends and relatives."

Among these letters was one from Nikolai Rostof to his father. Pierre took charge of it. Besides this, Count Rostopchin gave Pierre a copy of the sovereign's appeal to Moscow, just printed, the last orders to the army, and his own last "placard." Glancing over the army orders, Pierre found in one of them, which mentioned the names of the killed, wounded, or rewarded, that Nikolai Rostof had been decorated with a "George" of the fourth class on account of his gallantry in the affair at Ostrovno; and in the same "general order," the nomination of Prince Andrei Bolkonsky as commander of a regiment of Jägers. Although he had no wish to remind the Rostofs of Bolkonsky, still he could not restrain the desire to rejoice their hearts by the news of the reward granted their son; and so, keeping in his own possession the proclamation, the "placard," and the other orders, which he proposed to carry when he went there to dinner, he immediately sent them the printed order and Nikolai's letter.
His conversation with Count Rostopchin, whose tone of anxiety and nervousness struck him, his meeting with the courier, who had some careless story to tell of things going ill in the army, the rumors of spies found in Moscow, and of a paper circulating in the city which declared that Napoleon by autumn had promised to occupy both of the Russian capitals, the talk about the expected arrival of the sovereign on the morrow,—all this gave new strength to that feeling of excitement and expectation which had not left him since the night when the comet had first appeared, and especially since the outbreak of the war.

The notion of entering the active military service had, for some time, been much in his mind: and he would assuredly have done so if, in the first place, he had not been deterred by the fact that he belonged to that Masonic fraternity, to which he had bound himself by a solemn pledge, and which preached eternal peace and the cessation of war; and, in the second place, because, as he beheld the great numbers of the inhabitants of Moscow who had donned uniforms and were preaching patriotism, he was somehow ashamed to do so. But the chief reason that deterred him from carrying out the idea of entering the military service was to be found in that obscure conception that he, l'russe Besuhof, who carried with him the number of the beast, —666,— was destined to take some great part in putting bounds to the power of the beast that spoke great things and blasphemies; and that, therefore, he ought not to undertake anything, but to await and see what was meant for him to accomplish.

CHAPTER XX

The Rostofs, as usual on Sundays, had some of their intimate friends to dine with them.

Pierre went early, so as to find them alone.

Pierre had grown so stout this year that he would have seemed monstrous had he not been so tall, so broad-shouldered, and so strong that he carried his weight with evident ease.

Panting, and muttering something to himself, he hurried up-stairs. His coachman no longer thought of asking him whether he should wait for him. He knew, by this time, that when the count was at the Rostofs' he would stay till midnight. The Rostofs' lackeys cheerfully hastened forward to take his cloak and receive his hat and cane. Pierre, from club habit, left his cane and hat in the anteroom.

The first person whom he saw was Natasha. Even before he had caught sight of her, and while he was taking off his cloak in the anteroom, he heard her singing solfeggii in the music-room.

He knew that she had not sung a note since her illness, and, therefore, the sounds of her voice surprised and delighted him. He gently opened the door, and saw Natasha in the lilac-colored dress, in which she had been to mass, pacing up and down the room and singing. She was walking with her back toward him when he opened the door, but, when she turned short about, and recognized his stout, amazed face, she blushed, and came swiftly toward him.

"I want to get into the habit of singing again," said she. "It is quite an undertaking," she added, as if to excuse herself.

"And it is splendid!"

"How glad I am that you have come! I am so happy to-day," she cried, with something of that old vivacity which Pierre had so long missed in her. "You know Nicolas has received the Georgievsky cross. I am so proud of him!"

"Certainly; I sent you the 'order of the day.' Well, I will not interrupt you," he added, "but I will go into the drawing-room."

Natasha called him back.

"Count, tell me, is it wrong in me to be singing?" she asked, with a blush, but looking inquiringly into Pierre's face, without dropping her eyes.
"No! why?... On the contrary.... but why did you ask me?"

"I am sure I don't know," replied Natasha, quickly; "but I did not wish to do anything that you would not approve. I have such perfect confidence in you! You don't know what you are to me, how much you have done for me!" She spoke rapidly, and noticed not how Pierre reddened at these words. "I saw that he — I mean Bolkonsky" — she spoke this name in a hurried whisper — "was mentioned in the same order; so then he is in Russia and serving again. What do you think?" she asked, still speaking rapidly, evidently in haste to finish what she had to say, lest she should not have the strength necessary to do so — "will he ever forgive me? Will he not always bear me ill-will? What do you think about it? What do you think about it?"

"I think...." Pierre began, "I think he has nothing to forgive. .... If I were in his place...."

By the force of recollection, Pierre was in an instant carried back, in his imagination, to that moment when, in order to comfort her, he had said that if he were the best man in the world, and free, he would, on his knees, ask for her hand; and now the same feeling of pity, tenderness, and love took possession of him, and the same words were on his lips. But she did not give him time to say them.

"Yes, you, you," said she, with a peculiar solemnity, repeating and dwelling on the pronoun — "you — that is another thing. I know no man who is kinder, nobler, better; and there could not be. If it had not been for you, then, and now too, I don't know what would have become of me, because...." the tears suddenly filled her eyes; she turned around, held her music before her face, and began to sing her scales, and started to walk up and down the room once more.

At this moment, Petya came running in from the drawing-room. Petya was now a handsome, ruddy lad of fifteen, with thick, red lips, and looked like Natasha. He was preparing for the university, but lately he and his comrade, Obolyensky, had secretly resolved that they would enter the hussars.

He sprang forward to his namesake, in order to speak with him about this. He had been begging him to find out whether he could be admitted to the hussars. Pierre went into the drawing-room, not heeding the lad.

Petya pulled him by the arm, in order to attract his attention. "Now tell me, Piotr Kiriluitch, for Heaven's sake, how is my business getting on? Is there any hope for us?" asked Petya.

"Oh, yes, your business. The hussars, is it? I will inquire about it; I will tell you about it, I will tell you the whole story this very day."

"Well now, my dear, have you brought the manifesto?" asked the old count. "The 'little countess' was at mass at the Razumovskys', and heard the new prayer. Very fine, they say!"

"Yes, I have brought it," replied Pierre. "The sovereign will be here to-morrow.... A special meeting of the nobility has been called, and they say there is to be a levy of ten out of every thousand. And I congratulate you!"

"Yes, yes, glory to God. Now tell me what is the news from the army?"

"We are still retreating. At Smolensk by this time, they say," replied Pierre.

"My God! My God!" exclaimed the count. "Where is the manifesto?"

"The proclamation? Oh, yes!"

Pierre began to search his pockets for the papers, but could not find them. While still rummaging through his pockets, he kissed the countess's hand, who, at that moment, came in, and he looked around uneasily, evidently expecting to see Natasha, who had ceased to sing but had not as yet rejoined the others.

"On my word, I don't know what I have done with them!" he exclaimed.

"Well, you're always losing things," exclaimed the countess.
Natasha came in with a softened, agitated expression of countenance, and sat down, looking at Pierre without speaking. As soon as she appeared, Pierre's face, till then darkened with a frown, grew bright, and though he was still searching for the papers, he kept looking at her.

"By Heavens! I must have left them at home. I will go after them. Most certainly...."

"But you will be late to dinner."

"Akh! and my coachman has gone too!"

Sonya, however, who had gone into the anteroom to look for the missing papers, found them in Pierre's hat, where he had carefully stuck them under the lining. Pierre wanted to read them immediately.

"No, not till after dinner," said the old count, evidently anticipating the greatest treat in this reading.

At dinner, during which they drank the health of the new knight of St. George in champagne, Shinshin related all the gossip of the town: about the illness of the old Princess of Gruzia, and how Métiévier had disappeared from Moscow, and how they had arrested some German and brought him to Rostopchin, claiming that he was a shampinion.

Count Rostopchin had himself told the story, and how Rostopchin had commanded them to let the shampinion go, assuring the people that he was not a shampinion, but simply an old German toadstool!

"They 'll catch it! they 'll catch it!" said the count; "I have been telling the countess that she must n't talk French so much. It is not the time to do it now."

"And have you heard?" proceeded Shinshin. "Prince Golitsuin has taken a Russian tutor—to teach him Russian. It is beginning to be dangerous to speak French in the street."

"Well, Count Piotr Kiriluitch, if they are going to mobilize the landwehr, you 'll have to get on horseback, won't you?" asked the old count, addressing Pierre.

Yeî Bogu.

French champignon, a mushroom.—Slang term, meaning a Frenchman.
Pierre was taciturn and thoughtful all dinner-time. As if not comprehending, he gazed at the old count when thus addressed.

"Yes, yes, about the war," said he. "No! what kind of a soldier should I be? But, after all, how strange everything is! how strange! I can't understand it myself. I don't know; my tastes are so far from being military, but as things are now no one can answer for himself."

After dinner the count seated himself comfortably in his chair, and, with a grave face, asked Sonya, who was an accomplished reader, to read.

"To Moscow, our chief capital: —

"The enemy has come with overwhelming force to invade the boundaries of Russia. He is here to destroy our beloved fatherland," read Sonya, in her clear voice. The count listened with his eyes shut, sighing heavily at certain passages.

Natasha, with strained attention, sat looking inquiringly now at her father and now at Pierre.

Pierre was conscious of her glance fastened on him, and strove not to look round. The countess shook her head sternly and disapprovingly at each enthusiastic expression contained in the manifesto, for everything made her see that the danger threatening her son would not soon pass by.

Shinshin, with his lips formed to a satiric smile, was evidently making ready to turn into ridicule whatever first gave him a good opportunity: Sonya's reading, or what the count should say, or even the proclamation itself, if that offered him a suitable pretext.

Having read about the perils threatening Russia, the hopes which the sovereign placed in Moscow, and especially in its illustrious nobility, Sonya, with a trembling voice, which was caused principally by the fact that they were following her so closely, read the following words: —

"We shall not be slow to take our place amidst our people in this capital, and in other cities of our empire, so as to lead in deliberations and to take the direction of all our troops, not only those which are at the present time blocking the way of the foe, but also those that are gathering to cause his defeat wherever he may show himself. And may the destruction in which he thinks to involve us react upon his own head, and may Europe, delivered from servitude, magnify the name of Russia!

"That's the talk!" cried the count, opening his moist eyes, and several times catching his breath with a noise as if a bottle of strong smelling-salts had been put to his nose; he went on to say, "Only say the word, sire, and we will sacrifice everything without a regret!"

Shinshin had no time to utter the little joke which he had ready at the expense of the count's patriotism before Natasha sprang up from her place and ran to her father.

"How lovely he is — this papa of mine!" she exclaimed, giving him a kiss; and then she glanced at Pierre again with the same unconscious coquetry which had come back to her together with her animation.

"What a little patriotka¹ she is!" cried Shinshin.

"Not a patriotka at all, but simply ...." began Natasha, offended. "You turn everything into ridicule, but this is no joke." ....

"What jokes!" exclaimed the count. "Let him only say the word, and we will all follow .... we are not Germans or ...."

"And did you notice," said Pierre, "that it spoke 'about deliberations'?

"Well, whatever he is here for ...."

At that moment Petya, to whom no one had been paying any attention, came up to his father, and, all flushed, said, in that voice of his, which was now breaking, and was sometimes bass and sometimes treble, "Now, then, papenka, my mind is perfectly made up — and, mamenka, too, if you please — I tell you both my mind is made up; you must let me go into the military service, because I cannot .... and that 's the end of it." ....

¹ The feminine of patriot.
The countess raised her eyes to heaven in dismay, clasped her hands, and turned severely to her husband:

"Just think what he has said!"

But the count instantly recovered from his emotion.

"Well, well!" said he. "A fine soldier you are! A truce to such folly! You must study!"

"It is not folly, papenka. Fedya Obolyensky is younger than I am, and he is going; but, even if he were n't, I could never think of studying now when...."

Petya hesitated, and flushed so that the perspiration stood out on his forehead, but still finished,—"When the country is in danger."

"There! there! enough of this nonsense!"....

"But you yourself just said that we would sacrifice everything!"

"Petya! I tell you hold your tongue!" cried the count, glancing at his wife, who had turned white, and was gazing with fixed eyes at her youngest son.

"But I tell you—and here is Piotr Kirillovitch will speak about it...."

"And I tell you it is all rubbish! the milk is n't dry on your lips yet; and here you are wanting to go into the army! Nonsense, I tell you!"

And the count, gathering up the papers, which he evidently intended to read over again in his cabinet before going to bed, started to leave the room.

"Piotr Kirillovitch, come and have a smoke."....

Pierre was in a state of confusion and uncertainty. Natasha's unnaturally brilliant and animated eyes fixed on him steadily rather than affectionately had brought him into this state.

"No, I think I will go home."....

"What? Go home? I thought you were going to spend the evening with us.... And, besides, you don't come as often as you did. And this girl of mine...." said the count, affectionately indicating Natasha, "is merry only when you are here."....

"Yes, but I had forgotten something.... I must certainly go home..... Some business...." said Pierre, hastily “Well, then, good-by,” said the count, and he left the room.

“Why must you go? Why are you so out of spirits? What is it?” asked Natasha, looking inquiringly into Pierre’s eyes.

“Because I love thee!” was what was on his lips to say, but he did not say it; he reddened till the tears came, and dropped his eyes.

“Because it is better for me not to be here so much.... because.... No, simply because I have some business.”....

“What, is it? No! Tell me,” Natasha began resolutely, but suddenly stopped. The two looked at each other in dismay and confusion. He tried to smile, but it was a vain attempt; his smile expressed his suffering, and he kissed her hand without speaking, and left the house.

Pierre decided that he must not visit at the Rostofs’ any more.

CHAPTER XXI

Petya, after the decided repulse which he had received, went to his room, and there, apart from every one, wept bitterly. All pretended, however, not to remark his red eyes, when he came down to tea, silent and gloomy.

On the following day the sovereign arrived. Several of the Rostofs’ household serfs asked permission to go and see the Tsar.

That morning it took Petya a long time to dress, comb his hair, and arrange his collar, so as to make it look as full-grown men wore theirs. He stood scowling before the mirror, making gestures, lifting his shoulders; and, at last, saying nothing to any one, he put on his cap, and left the house by the back door, so as not to be observed.

1 Da svidanya, like au revoir, auf wiedersehen.
Petya had made up his mind to go straight to the place where the sovereign was, and to give a perfectly straightforward explanation to one of the chamberlains—he supposed the sovereign was always surrounded by chamberlains—and tell him that he, Count Rostof, in spite of his youth, wished to serve his country, that his youth could not be an obstacle in the way of devotion, and that he was ready....

Petya, by the time he was all dressed, was well fortified with fine words which he should say to the chamberlain.

Petya relied for the success of his application to the sovereign on the very fact that he was a mere child—he thought even that they would all be amazed at his youth—and, at the same time, by the arrangement of his nice little collar, and the combing of his hair, and his slow and dignified gait, he was anxious to give the impression of being a full-grown man.

But the farther he went, and the more he was involved in the throngs and throngs of people gathering around the Kreml, the more he forgot to keep up that appearance of dignity and moderation which marks the full-grown man.

As he approached the Kreml, he had a hard struggle to keep from being jostled; and this he did by putting on a decidedly threatening face, and resolutely applying his elbows to opposing ribs. But at Trinity Gate, in spite of all his resolutions, the people, who evidently had no idea what patriotic object brought him to the Kreml, crushed him up against the wall in such a way that he had to make a virtue of the necessity, and pause, while through the gateway rolled the equipages, thundering by under the vaulted arch.

Near Petya stood a peasant woman and a lackey, two merchants, and a discharged soldier. After standing some time at the Gate, Petya determined not to wait until all the carriages had passed, but to push farther on in advance of the others; and he began to work his elbows vigorously; but the peasant woman, who stood next him, and was the first to feel the application of his elbows, screamed at him angrily:
“Here, my little barchuk,¹ what are you poking me for? Don’t you see every one is standing still? Where are you trying to get to?”

“That’s a game more than one can work,” said the lackey, and, also vigorously plying his elbows, he sent Petya into the ill-smelling corner of the gateway.

Petya wiped his hot face with his hands, and tried to straighten up his collar, which had collapsed with the perspiration—that collar which, at home, he had so successfully arranged to look like a man’s.

He felt that he now was in an unpresentable state, and he was afraid that if he went to the chamberlain in such a plight, he would not be allowed to approach the sovereign. But to put himself to rights, or to get from where he was to another place, was an impossibility, owing to the throng. One of the generals passing by was an acquaintance of the Rostofs. Petya started to ask his help; but he came to the conclusion that that would not be compatible with manliness.

After all the equipages had passed, the throng burst through, and carried Petya along with it into the square, which was also full of the populace: Not the square alone, but the slopes and the housetops, every available place, was full of people. As soon as Petya got fairly into the square, he clearly heard the sounds of the bells filling all the Kremlin, and the joyous shouts of the people.

At one time there was more room on the square, but suddenly every head was bared, and the whole mass of people rushed forward. Petya was so crushed that he could hardly breathe, and still the acclamations rent the air: “Hurrah! hurrah! hurrah!” Petya got upon his tiptoes, pushed and pinched, but still he could see nothing except the people around him.

All faces wore one and the same expression of emotion and enthusiasm. One woman, a merchant’s wife, standing near Petya, sobbed, and the tears streamed from her eyes.

¹Barchenok, barchuk, is the popular diminutive of baritch, that is to say, the son of a barin, or nobleman, gentleman.
"Father! angel! batyushka!" she cried, rubbing the tears away with her fingers.

"Hurrah! hurrah!" resounded on every side.

The throng, for a single instant, stood still in one place; then it rushed onward again.

Petya, entirely forgetting himself, set his teeth together like a wild beast, and, with his eyes starting from his head, plunged forward, using his elbows, and shouting "Hurrah!" at the top of his voice, as if he were ready and willing that moment to kill himself and every one else; while on every side of him there were ever the same wild faces uttering the same shouts: "Hurrah! hurrah!"

"So, then, that's the kind of a man the sovereign is!" thought Petya. "No, it would be impossible for me to deliver my petition in person; it would be quite too audacious."

Nevertheless, he still struggled desperately forward, and, just beyond the backs in front of him, he could see an empty space, with a lane covered with red cloth; but at this instant the throng ebbed back; the police in front were driving them away from the path of the procession, which they were incommoding; the sovereign was on his way from the palace to the Uspiensky Cathedral, and Petya unexpectedly received such a blow in the ribs, and was so crushed, that suddenly everything grew confused before his eyes, and he lost consciousness.

When he came to himself, a strange priest,—apparently a diachok,—in a well-worn blue cassock, and with a long mane of gray hair, was supporting him with one arm, and with the other defending him from the pressure of the throng.

"You have crushed a young nobleman!" cried the diachok. "Look out, there! Easy!—You have crushed him! You have crushed him!"

The sovereign entered the Uspiensky Cathedral. The crowd again thinned out a little, and the priest took Petya, pale and hardly able to breathe, to the Tsar-pushka, or King of Guns. Several persons expressed their pity for Petya, but then suddenly the throng surged up against him again, and he was already involved in the billows of the mob. But those who stood nearest to him gave him a helping hand, while others unbuttoned his coat, and got him up to the top of the cannon, and reviled some of those who had treated him so brutally.

1 Barchenok, nobleman's son.

"Would you crush him to death that way!" ... "What do you mean?" ... "Why, it's downright murder!" ... "See the poor fellow, he's as white as a sheet!" said various voices.

Petya quickly recovered himself, the color returned to his cheek, his pain passed off, and, as a compensation for this momentary discomfort, he had his place on the cannon, from which he hoped to see the sovereign pass by on his way back. Petya no longer even thought of preferring his request. If he could only see him, then he should consider himself perfectly happy!

During the time of the service in the Uspiensky Cathedral, which consisted of a Te Deum in honor of the sovereign's arrival, and a thanksgiving for the conclusion of peace with Turkey, the throng thinned out, peddlers of kvas, gingerbread, and poppy seeds— which Petya specially affected— made their appearance proclaiming their wares, and the ordinary chatter of a crowd was heard.

A merchant's wife was lamenting her torn shawl and telling how much it had cost her. Another made the remark that at the present time all sorts of silk stuffs were dear. The diachok, Petya's rescuer, was disputing with an official as to who and who were assisting his eminence in the service. The priest several times repeated the word sobornye,¹ which Petya did not understand. Two young fellows were jesting with some servant-girls, who were munching nuts.

All these conversations, especially the jokes with the girls, which ordinarily would have been extremely fascinating to Petya at his age, now entirely failed to attract his attention. He sat on his coign of vantage—the

¹ A Slavonic word signifying that all the clergy of the cathedral (sobor) assisted.

vol. iv. — 8
cannon—just as much excited as ever at the thought of his sovereign and of his love for him. The coincidence of his feeling of pain and terror when they were crushing him, and his feeling of enthusiasm still more strengthened in him the consciousness of the importance of this moment. Suddenly, from the embankment were heard the sounds of cannon-shots,—they were fired in commemoration of the peace with the Turks,—and the throng rushed eagerly toward the embankment to see them fire the cannon.

Petya wanted to go, too, but the priest who had taken the young nobleman under his protection would not permit it. These guns were still firing when from the Uspiensky Cathedral came a number of officers, generals, and chamberlains; then, more deliberately, came still others; again heads were uncovered, and those who had rushed to see the firing came running back. Last of all there emerged from the portal of the cathedral four men in uniforms and ribbons. "Hurrah! hurrah!" shouted the throng.

"Which is he? Which one?" asked Petya, in a tearful voice, of those around him, but no one gave him any answer; all were too much preoccupied; and Petya, selecting one of these four personages, which he had some difficulty in doing, owing to the tears of joy that blinded his eyes, concentrated on him all his enthusiasm—although it happened not to be the monarch!—and shouted "Hurrah!" in a frenzied voice, and made up his mind that, the very next day, cost what it might, he would become a soldier.

The throng rushed after the sovereign, accompanied him to the palace, and then began to disperse. It was already late, and Petya had eaten nothing, and the perspiration was streaming from him; still he had no idea of going home yet, and all through the time that the sovereign was eating his dinner he stood in front of the palace with the diminished but still enormous throng, gazing at the windows of the palace, still expecting something, and envying the dignitaries who came up to the doorway to take part in the dinner, and even the footmen who were serving the tables and passing swiftly in front of the windows.

During the dinner Valuyef, glancing out of the window, remarked to the sovereign:

"The people are still hoping to have another glimpse of your majesty."

Just before the banquet was finished, the sovereign arose, still eating the last of a biscuit, and went out on the balcony. The throng, Petya in the number, rushed toward the balcony, shouting, "Angel! batyushka! hurrah!"

"Father!"... cried the people, and Petya also, and again the women and some of the men of weaker mold — Petya among the number — wept for joy.

A pretty good-sized piece of the biscuit which the sovereign held in his hand crumbled and dropped on the railing of the balcony, and from the railing to the ground. A coachman in a sleeveless coat, standing nearer than any one else, sprang forward and seized this crumb. Several of the throng flung themselves on the coachman. The sovereign, perceiving this, commanded a plate of biscuits to be handed to him, and began to toss them from the balcony.

Petya's eyes were bloodshot; the danger of being crushed to death again threatened him, but he rushed for the biscuits. He knew not why, but his happiness depended on having one of those biscuits from the Tsar's hand, and he was bound he would not give in. He sprang forward and knocked over an old woman who was just grasping a biscuit. But the old woman had no idea of considering herself vanquished, although she was flat on the ground, for she held the biscuit clutched in her fist, and had not dropped it. Petya knocked it out of her hand with his knee, and seized it, and, as if fearing that he should be too late, he shouted "Hurrah!" with his hoarse voice.

The sovereign retired, and after this the larger part of the crowd began to separate. "I said there'd be something more to see, and so it turned out," said various voices, joyously, amid the throng.
Happy as Petya was, it was, nevertheless, a gloomy prospect for him to go home, and know that all the happiness of the day was done. Instead, therefore, of going home, he left the Kreml, and went to find his comrade, Obolyensky, who was also fifteen years old, and who also was bent upon going into the army.

When, at last, he reached his home, he clearly and definitely declared that, if they would not give him their permission, he would run away. And, on the next day, Count Ilya Andreyitch, though not fully decided to give his assent, went to learn in what way some place might be found for Petya, where he would be least exposed to danger.

CHAPTER XXII

On the morning of the twenty-seventh, three days later, a countless throng of equipages were drawn up in the vicinity of the Slobodsky palace.

The halls were all crowded. In the front room were the nobles in their uniforms; in the second room were the merchants, wearing medals, beards, and blue kaftans.

There was a bustle and movement in the room where the nobles were gathered. Around a great table, over which hung a portrait of the sovereign, sat the most distinguished dignitaries, in high-backed chairs; but the majority of the nobles were walking up and down.

All the nobles—the very men whom Pierre was accustomed to see every day at the club or at their own homes—were in uniforms; some dating from Catherine's time, some from Paul's, some in the newer-fashioned ones that had come in with Alexander, some in the ordinary uniform of the Russian nobility; and those who wore this characteristic uniform, young and old, no matter how much they differed from one another in type or how well-known they were, had something strange and fantastic about them. Especially noticeable were the old men, dull-eyed, toothless, bald, with flesh turning to yellow fat, or wrinkled and thin. These, for the most part, sat in their places and had nothing to say; and if they walked about and talked, they addressed themselves to men their juniors. Likewise, as in the faces of the throng which Petya had seen on the Kreml square, so here these faces wore a most astounding contrariety of expressions, the general expectation of some solemn event, and the usual evening's routine: the party of Boston, Petrusha the cook, the exchange of greetings with Zinaida Dmitrievna, and things of the sort.

Pierre, who since early morning had been pinched into an uncomfortable and too tightly fitting court uniform, was present. He was in a high state of excitement; a meeting extraordinary, not only of the nobility, but also of the merchant class—a legislative assembly, états généraux—had awakened in him a whole throng of ideas about the Contrat social, and the French Revolution—ideas which he had long ago ceased to entertain, but were, nevertheless, deeply engraven in his mind. The words of the proclamation which said that the sovereign was coming to his capital, for the purpose of deliberating with his people, confirmed him in this opinion. And thus supposing that the important reform which he had been long waiting to see introduced would now be tried, he walked about, looked on, listened to the conversations, but nowhere found any one expressing the ideas that occupied him.

The sovereign's manifesto was read, arousing great enthusiasm; and then the assembly broke up into groups, discussing affairs. Pierre heard men talking, not only about matters of universal interest, but also about such things as where the marshals of the nobility should stand when the sovereign came, when the ball should be given to his majesty, whether the division should be made by districts or taking the whole government, and other questions of the sort. But as soon as the war became a topic of conversation, or the object of calling the meeting of the nobility was mentioned, the discussions became vague and irresolute. All preferred to listen rather than to talk.

One middle-aged man of strikingly gallant bearing, and wearing the uniform of a retired officer of the navy, was talking in one room, and a group was gathered around him. Pierre joined it and began to listen. Count Ilya Andreyitch, in his Voevode's kaftan of Catherine's time, after making his way through the crowd, with a pleasant greeting for every one, also approached this same group, and began to listen, as he always listened, with his good-natured smile, and nodding his head to signify that his sentiments were in accord with the speaker's.

The retired naval man spoke very boldly—as could be judged by the faces of his listeners, and because certain of Pierre's acquaintances, well known for their submissive and gentle natures, turned away from him, or disagreed with what he said. Pierre forced his way into the center of this group, listened, and came to the conclusion that the speaker was genuinely liberal, but in a very different sense from what Pierre understood by liberality. The naval man spoke in that peculiar, ringing, singsong baritone characteristic of the Russian nobility, with an agreeable slurring of the R's and shortening of consonants—a voice, too, fitted to issue a command.

"Suppose the people of Smolensk have offered to raise militia for the sove'n. Can the Smolenskites lay down the law for us? If the ge'm'en of the Moscovite nobil'ty find it neces'y, they can show their devotion to their sove'n and emp'r in some other way. We have'n't forgotten the calling out of the landwehr in '07, have we? Only rasc'ly priests' sons and plund'r's got any good from it."....

Count Ilya Andreyitch, with a shadow of a smile, nodded his head approvingly.

"And I should like to know if our militia have ever done the empire any good? Not the least. They have merely ruined our farming int'rests. A levy is much better—for the militia man comes back to you neither a soldier nor a muzhik, but simply spoiled and good for nothing. The nobles don't grudge their lives; we are perfectly willing to take the field ourselves and bring along recruits with us; the sove'n has only to speak the word and we will all die for him," added the orator, growing excited.

Ilya Andreyitch swallowed down the spittle in his mouth with gratification at hearing such sentiments, and nudged Pierre, but Pierre also had a strong desire to speak. He pushed still farther forward; he felt that he was excited, but he had no idea what should cause him to speak, and as yet he had still less idea of what he was going to say. He had just opened his mouth to speak when a senator, who had absolutely no teeth at all, but who had a stern, intelligent face, suddenly interrupted Pierre. He had been standing near the naval orator. Evidently used to leading in debate, and holding his own in argument, he spoke in a low but audible voice:

"I suppose, my dear sir," said the senator—the words sounding thick, owing to his toothless mouth—"I suppose that we have been summoned here not for the purpose of deciding whether at the present moment enlistment of soldiers or levies of militia will be most beneficial for the empire, but we have been summoned here to respond to the proclamation which the emperor our sovereign has deigned to address to us. And the decision of the question which is the more advantageous—recruits or militia—we may safely leave to his supreme autho..."

Pierre suddenly found an outlet for his excitement. He was indignant with the senator for taking such a strict and narrow view of the functions of the nobility. Pierre took a step forward and interrupted the senator. He himself knew not what he was going to say, but he began hotly, occasionally breaking out into French expressions, and when he spoke in Russian, "talking like a book."

"Excuse me, your excellency," he began. Pierre was well acquainted with this senator, but now he felt that it was incumbent upon him to address him with perfunctory formality. "Although I cannot agree with the gentleman....” Pierre hesitated. He wanted to say Mon très-honorable préopinant—“with the gentleman — que je n'ai pas l'honneur de connaître — still I suppose that the nobility have been called together now not alone to express their sympathy and enthusiasm, but likewise to decide on the measures by which we may aid the fatherland. I suppose,” said he, growing still more animated, “I suppose that the sovereign himself would have been sorry if he saw in us nothing but owners of peasants whom we should give him as meat for—as chair à canon—but rather as co—co—counsellors....”

1 "He pronounced Gosudar, gusai": parenthesis in text.

Several moved away from this group as they noticed the senator’s scornful smile and the excitement under which Pierre was laboring; only Ilya Andreyitch was content with Pierre’s deliverance, just as he had been with the naval man’s speech and the senator’s, and, as a general rule, with the last one which he ever happened to hear.

“I suppose that before we decide these questions,” pursued Pierre, “we ought to ask the sovereign, we ought most respectfully to ask his majesty, to give us a full and definite account of how many troops we have, in what condition they are, and then ....”

But Pierre was not allowed to finish his sentence; he was attacked from three sides at once. More violently than by any one else he was assailed by an acquaintance of his of very long standing, always well disposed to him, and frequently his partner at Boston, Stepan Stepanovitch Adraksin. Stepan Stepanovitch was in uniform, and either it was the uniform or some other reason that made Pierre see himself opposed by an entirely different man from what he had ever known. Stepan Stepanovitch, with an expression of senile wrath suddenly flushing his face, screamed out at Pierre:—

“In the first place I would have you understand that we have no right to ask the sovereign any such thing, and in the second place even if the Russian nobility had such a right, even then the sovereign could not answer us. The movements of our troops depend upon those of the enemy.... the troops decrease and increase....”
Another man, of medium height, forty years old, whom Pierre had seen in days gone by at the gipsies', and knew as a wretched card-player, and who now like the rest had a wholly changed aspect in his uniform, interrupted Adraksin: "Yes, and besides it is not the time to criticize," said the voice of this noble, "but we must act; the war is in Russia. The enemy are coming to destroy Russia, to desecrate the tombs of our sires, to lead into captivity our wives and our children."

—The nobleman struck his chest a ringing blow.— "Let us all arise, let us all go as one man in defense of our batyushka, the Tsar!" he cried, wildly rolling his bloodshot eyes.

Several approving voices were heard in the throng.

"We Russians will never begrudge our lives for the defense of the faith, the throne, and the fatherland; but we must renounce day-dreams if we are the true sons of the country. Let us show Europe how Russia can defend Russia!" cried a nobleman.

Pierre wanted to make a reply, but he could not say a word. He was conscious that even the sound of his voice— independent of the meaning of what he would say—was less audible than the sound of the excited nobleman's voice.

Ilya Andreyitch stood just behind the circle, looking on approvingly; several applauded the speaker when he finished, and shouted:—

"Hear! Hear!"

Pierre was anxious to say that, while he would be ready to sacrifice himself to any extent, either in money or in his peasants, still he should like to know how affairs were situated before he could help, but he found it impossible to get a word in. Many voices spoke and shouted all at once, so that Ilya Andreyitch had no chance even to nod his head in assent to everything, and the group grew in size, broke asunder, and then formed again swaying and tumultuous, and moved across the room toward the great table.

Not only was Pierre prevented from speaking, but he was rudely interrupted, assailed, and pushed aside, and treated as if he were a common foe. This was not because they were dissatisfied with the sentiments which he expressed, for they had already forgotten what he had said after the multitude of other things spoken since, but what was necessary to excite the throng was some palpable object of love and some palpable object of hatred. Pierre had made himself the latter. Many orators followed the excited nobleman, and all spoke in the same tone. Many spoke eloquently and with originality.

The editor of the Russky Vyestnik, Glinka, who was well known, and was greeted with shouts of "The writer! the writer!" declared that hell must contend with hell; that he had seen a child smiling at the flashing of lightning and at the crashing of thunder, but that we should not be like such a child as that.

"No! no! we must not!" was heard approvingly spoken in the most distant circles.

The throng drifted up to the great table where sat the septuagenarian notables, old and gray and bald, in uniforms and ribbons, veterans whom Pierre had seen, almost without exception, at home with jests in their mouths or at the club-house playing Boston. The throng drew near the table, and still the roar of shouting and talk went on. One after the other, and sometimes two at once, pressing up against the high-backed chairs, the orators spoke their thoughts. Those who stood in the rear finished saying what any orator had no time to say to the end, and filled out the omitted passages. Others, in spite of the heat and closeness, racked their brains trying to find some new idea and to give it utterance. Pierre's friends, the aged notables, sat and gazed, now at one, now at the other, and the expression of the majority of their faces merely said that it was very hot.

Pierre, however, felt intensely excited, and a great

---

1 Sergyei Nikolayevitch Glinka, born at Smolensk 1776, founded the Russian Messenger, 1808, which, in 1812, was the very pillar of nationalism; he also, at his own cost, furnished twenty men for the militia; died 1847, leaving one hundred and fifty volumes of works.
desire came over him to have the meeting understand that he was as ready as the rest to be moved and stirred by that which was expressed more in the sounds of their voices and their looks than in the sense of the words they spoke. He had no intention of renouncing his convictions, but he somehow felt as if he were in the wrong, and he wanted to set himself right.

"I merely said that it would be easier for us to make sacrifices if we could know what was needed," he began to say, trying to outshout the rest.

A little old man who happened to be standing near him looked at him, but was immediately attracted by a shout raised at the other side of the table.

"Yes, Moscow shall be sacrificed! She shall be the deliverer!" some one was shouting.

"He is the enemy of the human race!" cried another.

"Allow me to speak." ....

"Gentlemen, you are crushing me!" ....

CHAPTER XXIII

At this moment, Count Rostopchin, in a general's uniform and with a broad ribbon across his shoulder, with his prominent chin and keen eyes, came into the room, and swiftly passed through the throng of nobles, who made way before him.

"Our sovereign, the emperor, will be here immediately," said Rostopchin. "I have just come from there. I think that in the position in which we find ourselves there is very little room for debate. The sovereign has deigned to call us and the merchant class together," said Count Rostopchin. "They in there control millions,"—he pointed to the hall where the merchants were,—"and it is our business to arm the militia, and not to spare ourselves. .... That is the least that we can do!"

The notables, sitting by themselves at the table, held a consultation. The whole consultation went more than quietly. It even seemed melancholy when, after all the noise and enthusiasm, these senile voices were heard, one after the other, saying, "I am content," or, for the sake of variety, "That is my opinion," and the like.

The secretary of the meeting was bidden to write that the Moscovites, in a meeting of the nobility, had unanimously resolved to follow the example of Smolensk, and offer a levy of ten men out of every thousand, completely armed and equipped.

The gentlemen who had been sitting arose, as if freed from a heavy task, noisily pushed back their chairs, and stirred about the hall so as to stretch their legs, perchance taking the arm of some acquaintance, and talking matters over.

"The sovereign! the sovereign!" was the cry suddenly shouted through the halls, and the whole throng rushed to the entrance.

Through a broad lane, between a wall of nobles, the sovereign entered the hall. All faces expressed a reverent and awesome curiosity. Pierre was standing at some little distance, and could not fully catch all that the sovereign said in his address.

He comprehended only from what he heard that the sovereign spoke about the peril in which the country stood, and the hopes which he placed upon the Moscovite nobility. Some one spoke in response to the sovereign's address, and merely confirmed the resolution which had just before been engrossed.

"Gentlemen," said the sovereign's trembling voice; a ripple of excitement ran through the throng, and then dead silence reigned again, and this time Pierre distinctly heard the sovereign's extremely agreeable voice, affected with genuine emotion, saying:—

"I have never doubted the devotion of the Russian nobility. But this day it has exceeded my expectations. I thank you in the name of the fatherland. Gentlemen, let us act — time is more precious than anything...."

The sovereign ceased speaking; the throng gathered round him, and on every side were heard enthusiastic exclamations.

"Yes, precious indeed — the Tsar's word!" said Ilya Andreyitch, with a sob; he had heard nothing, but put his own interpretation on everything.

The sovereign passed from the hall where the nobles were into that where the merchants were gathered. He remained there about ten minutes. Pierre and several others saw him on his way from their hall with tears of emotion in his eyes. As was learned afterwards, the sovereign had hardly begun his speech to the merchants before the tears had streamed from his eyes, and he had ended it in a voice broken with emotion. When Pierre saw him, he was coming out accompanied by two merchants. One was an acquaintance of Pierre's—a stout leaseholder; the other was the city provost, a man with a thin yellow face and a peaked beard. Both of them were in tears. The thin man wept, but the stout leaseholder was sobbing like a child, and kept saying:—

"Take our lives and our all, your majesty!"

Pierre at this moment felt no other desire than to prove how little he treasured anything, and that he was ready to make any sacrifice. He reproached himself for his speech with its constitutional tendency; he tried to think of some means to efface the impression which it had made. Learning that Count Mamonof had offered a regiment, Bezukhoi immediately announced to Count Rostopchin that he would give a thousand men and their maintenance.

Old Rostof could not refrain from tears when he told his wife what had been done, and he then and there granted Petya's request, and went himself to see that his name was enrolled.

The next day the sovereign took his departure. All the nobles who had assembled took off their uniforms, once more scattered to their homes and their clubs, and, groaning, gave orders to their overseers in regard to the militia, and marveled at what they had done.
PART TENTH

CHAPTER I

NAPOLEON entered upon the war with Russia because he could not help going to Dresden, could not help being befogged with honors, could not help putting on a Polish uniform, could not help feeling the stimulating impression of a June morning, could not help giving way to an outburst of fury in the presence of Kurakin and afterwards of Balashof.

Alexander declined all negotiations, because he felt that he had been personally insulted.

Barclay de Tolly strove to direct the troops in the very best way, so that he might do his duty and win the renown of being a great commander.

Rostof charged the French because he could not resist the temptation to make a dash across an open field.

And thus acted in exactly the same way, in accordance with their own natural characteristics, habits, dispositions, and aims, all the innumerable individuals who took part in this war. They had their fears and their vanities, they had their enjoyments and their fits of indignation, and they all supposed that they knew what they were doing, and that they were doing it for themselves; but they were in reality the irresponsible tools of history, and they brought about a work which they themselves could not realize, but which is plain for us to see.

Such is the inevitable fate of all who take an active part in life, and the higher they stand in the hierarchy of mankind the less free are they. Now, those who took part in the events of the year 1812 have long ago passed from the scene; their personal interests have vanished without leaving a trace, and only the historical results of that time are before us.
Let us now once admit that the armies of Europe, under the leadership of Napoleon, had to plunge into the depths of Russia, and there to perish, and all the self-contradictory, senseless, atrocious deeds of those who took part in this war become comprehensible for us.

Providence obliged all these men, who were each striving to attain his own ends, to work together for the accomplishment of one tremendous result, of which no man—neither Napoleon nor Alexander any more than the most insignificant participant—had the slightest anticipation.

It is now plain to us what caused the destruction of the French army in the year 1812. No one will attempt to dispute that the cause of the destruction of Napoleon's French troops was, on the one hand, their plunging into the depths of Russia too late in the season, and without sufficient preparation; and, on the other hand, the character given to the war by the burning of the Russian cities, and the consequent awakening in the Russian people of hatred against the foe.

But at that time not only had no one any idea of such a thing,—though now it seems so evident,—that an army of eight hundred thousand men, the best that the world had ever seen, and conducted by the greatest of leaders, could only in this way have met with its destruction in a collision with an army of half its size, inexperienced, and under the lead of inexperienced generals; not only no one had any idea of such a thing, but, moreover, all the exertions of the Russians were systematically directed toward preventing the only thing that could save Russia, and all the exertions of the French, in spite of Napoleon's experience and his so-called military genius, were directed toward reaching Moscow by the end of the summer—in other words, doing the very thing which was bound to prove his ruin.

French authors, in their accounts of the year 1812, are very fond of declaring that Napoleon felt the risk he ran in extending his line, that he sought to give battle, that his marshals advised him to halt at Smolensk.
And they bring forward other arguments of the sort, to prove that even then the peril of the Russian campaign was foreseen.

On the other hand, Russian authors are even more fond of declaring that, at the very beginning of the campaign, the scheme was already conceived of decoying Napoleon into the depths of Russia,—after the manner of the Scythians,—and some ascribe this scheme to Pfuhl, others to some Frenchman, others again to Toll, and still others to the Emperor Alexander himself. For their proof, they cite certain memoirs, suggestions, and letters, in which it really happens that allusions to some such mode of action can be found.

But all these allusions, suggesting that what was done either by the French or the Russians was the result of calculation, are made to look so at the present day simply because what actually took place has justified them.

If the event had not taken place, then these allusions would have been neglected, just as thousands and millions of hints and suggestions of entirely opposite character are now forgotten, though they were all the vogue at that time, but, having been found to be incorrect, are forgotten.

The issue of any event whatever is always involved in so many hypotheses, that no matter how it really turns some one will be found to say, "I told you it would happen so," entirely forgetting that among the numberless hypotheses others were made which proved to be perfectly erroneous.

To suppose that Napoleon foresaw the peril of extending his line and that the Russians thought of alluring the enemy into the depths of their country, evidently belongs to this category, and it is only by very forced reasoning that historians can ascribe such divination to Napoleon and such schemes to the Russian generals.

All the facts are absolutely opposed to such hypotheses.

The Russians throughout the war not only had no thought or desire to decoy the French into the depths of the country, but, on the other hand, everything was done to prevent them from making the first advance beyond their borders; and Napoleon not only had no fear of extending his line, but he felt a joy amounting to enthusiasm at every onward movement, and he showed no such eagerness as in his earlier campaigns to give battle.

At the very beginning of the campaign our armies are separated, and our single aim, in which we employ all our energies, is to unite them, whereas if it had been our intention to retreat and decoy the enemy into following us, there would not have been the slightest advantage in making a junction of the forces.

The emperor is with the army in order to inspire the troops to defend the Russian land and not to yield an inch of ground. The enormous fortified camp of the Drissa is established according to Pfuhl's design, and there is no thought of retreating. The sovereign reproaches the commander-in-chief for every backward step. The emperor could never have dreamed either of the burning of Moscow or the presence of the enemy at Smolensk, and when the armies are united the sovereign is exasperated because Smolensk is taken and burned, and because a general engagement is not delivered under its walls.

Such are the sovereign's views, but the Russian generals and all the Russian people are still more exasperated at the mere suggestion that our forces are falling back into the interior of the country.

Napoleon, having cut our armies asunder, moves on into the interior of the country, and neglects several opportunities for giving battle. In August he is at Smolensk, and his sole thought is how to advance into Russia, although, as we see now, this forward movement was certain to be destructive to him.

The facts prove that Napoleon did not foresee the risk of an advance on Moscow, and that Alexander and the Russian generals had no idea at that time of decoying Napoleon, but quite the contrary.

The luring of Napoleon into the heart of the country was not in accordance with any plan,—for no one believed in the possibility of such a plan,—but came about from the complicated play of intrigues, desires, and ambitions of the men who took part in this war and had no conception of what was destined to be, or what would prove, the only salvation of Russia.

Everything proceeds in the most unexpected way. Our armies are divided at the opening of the campaign. We try to unite them, with the evident aim of giving battle and checking the invasion of the enemy; but in trying to effect this union our troops avoid battle, because the enemy are stronger, and in our involuntary avoidance of them we form an acute angle, and draw the French as far as Smolensk. But it is not enough to say that we give way at an acute angle, because the French are moving between our two armies: the angle grows still more acute and we retreat still farther because Barclay de Tolly,¹ an unpopular German, is odious to Bagration, who has to act under his command, and Bagration, the commander of the other army, endeavors as far as possible to delay the conjunction, in order not to be under Barclay’s orders.

Bagration long delays the union of the two armies—though this has been the chief object of all the Russian generals; and he does so because he imagines that to make this march would endanger his troops, and that it is better for him to draw off farther to the left and south and harass the enemy on the flank and in the rear, and recruit his army in the Ukraïna.

But this is a pretext. He conceives this plan because he is anxious not to put himself under the command of Barclay, the hated German, whose rank is inferior to his own.

The emperor is with the army to inspire it, but his presence, and his tergiversation, and the tremendous throng of his advisers and plans paralyze the energy of the first army, and it beats a retreat.

¹ Barclay de Tolly (1759–1818) was not German, but of the old Scotch family of Barclay, a branch of which settled in Russia in the seventeenth century.
The plan then is to make a stand in the camp at Drissa, but suddenly Paulucci, who aims to be commander-in-chief, makes such an impression on Alexander by his energy, that Pfuhl's whole plan is abandoned, and the task is confided to Barclay. But as Barclay is not able to instil confidence, his power is limited.

The armies are separated; there is no unity, no head; Barclay is unpopular; but all this confusion, and division, and the unpopularity of the German commander-in-chief produce irresolution and the evasion of an encounter with the enemy, which would have been inevitable if the union of the armies had been accomplished, and if Barclay had not been designated as commander-in-chief, while on the other hand the same circumstances continually increase the feeling against the Germans, and more and more arouse the spirit of patriotism.

Finally, the sovereign leaves the army under the sole and most reasonable pretext that he is needed at the capital to stir up the people and incite a national war. And the sovereign's journey to Moscow triples the strength of the Russian troops.

The sovereign leaves the army in order that he may not interfere with the power of the commander-in-chief, and hopes that more decisive measures will be taken. But the position of the chief of the army grows more and more confused and helpless. Benigsen, the grand duke, and a whole swarm of general-adjutants remain in the army to watch the actions of the commander-in-chief and to stimulate him to energetic action; and Barclay, feeling himself still less free under the eyes of all these imperial censors, grows still more cautious about undertaking any decided operation, and carefully avoids a battle.

Barclay stands on his guard. The tsesarevitch hints at treason and demands a general attack. Liubomirski, Brannitski, Wlotzki, and others of their ilk add so much to all this tumult that Barclay, to rid himself of them, sends the Polish general-adjutants to Petersburg with pretended messages for the sovereign, and enters into an open dispute with Benigsen and the grand duke.

1 Slaz gosudarevuikh: literally, sovereign eyes.

At last, against the wishes of Bagration, the union of the two armies is effected at Smolensk.

Bagration drives in his carriage to the house occupied by Barclay. Barclay puts on his scarf, comes out to meet him, and salutes him as his superior in rank. Bagration, in this conflict of magnanimity, places himself under Barclay's command, in spite of his superiority of rank, but though he takes a subordinate position he is still less in agreement with him. Bagration, by the sovereign's express order, makes direct reports. He writes to Arakche耶v:

My sovereign's will be done, but I can never work with the minister [Barclay]. For God's sake send me where you will, give me only a single regiment to command, but I cannot stay here. — Headquarters are full of Germans, so that it is impossible for a Russian to breathe here, and there is no sense in anything. I thought that I was serving the sovereign and my country, but I am really serving Barclay. I confess this does not suit me.

The swarm of Brannitskis, of Winzengerodes, and others like them, still further poisons the relations between the two chiefs, and united action becomes more and more impossible.

They get ready to attack the French at Smolensk. A general is sent to inspect the position. This general, hating Barclay, instead of obeying orders, goes to one of his friends, a corps commander, remains with him all day, and returns at night to Barclay, to criticize at all points a field of battle which he has not even seen.

While quarrels and intrigues concerning the battlefield are in progress, while we are trying to find the French, because we are ignorant of their whereabouts, the French encounter Nevyerovsky's division, and approach the very walls of Smolensk.

It is necessary to accept an unexpected battle at Smolensk in order to save our communications. The battle takes place, thousands of men on both sides are killed.

Contrary to the wishes of the sovereign and the people, Smolensk is abandoned. But the inhabitants of Smolensk, betrayed by their governor, set fire to the city, and, offering this example to other Russian towns, take refuge in Moscow, thinking only of their losses, and kindling hatred against the enemy.

Napoleon advances; we retreat, and the result is that the very measure necessary for defeating Napoleon is employed.

CHAPTER II

On the day following his son's departure, Prince Nikolai Andreyitch summoned the Princess Mariya.

"There, now, are you satisfied?" he demanded. "You have involved me in a quarrel with my son! Satisfied? That was what you wanted! Satisfied?... This is painful, painful, to me. I am old and feeble, and this was what you wished. Well, take your pleasure in it, take your pleasure in it!"....

And after that the Princess Mariya saw no more of her father for a whole week. He was ill and did not leave his room.

To her amazement, the princess noticed that during this illness the old prince did not permit even Mlle. Bourienne to come near him. Only Tikhon was admitted.

At the end of the week, the prince came out and began to lead his former life again, occupying himself with special zeal in his buildings and gardens, but discontinuing all his former relations with Mlle. Bourienne. His looks and his coolness toward the Princess Mariya seemed to say to her:—

'Here, you see, you have lied about me, you have slandered me to Prince Andrei in regard to my relations with this Frenchwoman, and you have made me quarrel with him; but, you see, I can get along without you or the Frenchwoman either.'
One-half of the day the Princess Mariya spent with Nikolushka, attending to his lessons; she herself taught him Russian and music, and talked with Dessalles; the remainder of the day she spent with her books, her old nurse, and her "God's people," who sometimes came to see her clandestinely by the backstairs.

The Princess Mariya had such thoughts about the war as women generally have regarding war. She trembled for her brother, who was in it; she was horror-struck at the cruelty which led men to slaughter each other, though she had little comprehension of its reality; but she did not appreciate the significance of this particular war, which seemed to her exactly like the wars that had preceded it.

She did not realize it, although Dessalles, with whom she was constantly associated, followed its course with passionate interest, and tried to explain what he felt about it; and although the "God's people" who came to see her brought to her the popular rumors about the invasion of Antichrist; and although Julie, now the Princess Drubetskaya, who had again begun to correspond with her, wrote her patriotic letters from Moscow.

I am going to write to you in Russian, — pa Russki,— my dear friend [wrote Julie], because I hate all the French, and their language likewise. I cannot even bear to hear it spoken. Here in Moscow we are all carried away by our enthusiasm for our idolized emperor.

My poor husband is enduring hunger and privations at Jewish taverns; but the tidings which I get from him still further excite me.

You have undoubtedly heard of the heroic action of Rayevsky, who embraced his two sons, saying, "I will perish with them, but we will never yield." And, indeed, though the enemy was twice as strong as we were, we did not yield.

We spend our time as best we can; during war, it must be as during war. The Princesses Alina and Sophie spend whole days with me, and we wretched widows of living husbands, while raveling lint, have good long talks; only you, my dear, are absent.

And so on.
The principal reason why the Princess Mariya did not realize the whole significance of this war was that the old prince never said a word about it, never mentioned it, and, at dinner, often laughed at Dessalles, who would grow eloquent over it. The prince's tone was so calm and firm that the Princess Mariya believed in him without question.

All through the month of July, the old prince was extraordinarily active and energetic. He set out another new orchard, and built a new building for the use of his household serfs. The only thing that disquieted the Princess Mariya was that he slept very little, and, relinquishing his ordinary habit of sleeping in his cabinet, he each day changed his sleeping-room. One time he gave orders to have his camp bedstead set up in the gallery; then he would try the sofa, or the Voltaire easy-chair in the drawing-room, and doze without undressing, while the lad Petrusha—and not Mlle. Bourienne—read aloud to him; then, again, he would spend the night in the dining-room.1

Early in August, he received a second letter from Prince Andreï. In the first, which came soon after his departure for the army, Prince Andreï humbly begged his father's pardon for what he had permitted himself to say to him, and besought him to restore him to favor. The old prince had replied to this in an affectionate letter, and it was shortly after that he gave up his intimacy with the Frenchwoman.

Prince Andreï's second letter, written from near Vitebsk, after it had been captured by the French, contained a brief account of the campaign, with the plan of it sketched out, and also his ideas as to the ultimate issue of it. In the same letter Prince Andreï represented to his father the inconvenience of his position so near to the theater of the war, in the very line of march of the armies, and urged him to go to Moscow.

At dinner that day, hearing Dessalles mentioning the rumor that the French had already reached Vitebsk, the old prince remembered his letter from Prince Andreï.

1 This was a characteristic of Napoleon at St. Helena.
"I had a letter from Prince Andreï to-day," said he.
"Have n't you read it?"

"No, mon père," replied the princess, timidly. She could not possibly have read the letter, as she did not even know that one had been received.

"He writes me about this campaign," said the old prince, with that scornful smile which had become habitual with him, and which always accompanied any mention of the war then in progress.

"It must be very interesting," said Dessalles. "The prince is in a position to know...."

"Ah, very interesting," interrupted Mlle. Bourienne.

"Go and fetch it to me," said the old prince to Mlle. Bourienne. "It's on the little table, you know, under the paper-weight."

Mlle. Bourienne sprang away with eager haste.

"Oh, no," he cried, scowling; "do you go, Mikhaïl Ivanuitch."

Mikhaïl Ivanuitch got up and went into the cabinet. But, as he did not immediately return with it, the old prince, uneasily glancing around, threw down his napkin and went himself.

"He won't be able to find it; he'll upset everything."

While he was gone, the Princess Mariya, Dessalles, Mlle. Bourienne, and even Nikolushka silently exchanged glances. The old prince came hurrying back, accompanied by Mikhaïl Ivanuitch, and bringing the letter and a plan; but instead of letting them be read during the dinner-time he placed them by his side.

Passing into the drawing-room, he handed the letter to the Princess Mariya, and, spreading out the plan of the new building, he began to study it, but at the same time commanded the Princess Mariya to read the letter aloud. After she had read it, she looked inquiringly at her father. He was studying the plan, apparently immersed in his thoughts.

"What do you think about this, prince?" asked Dessalles, hazard ing the question.

"I.... I?".... exclaimed the prince, as if he were aroused to some disagreeable reality, but still not taking his eyes from the plan.

"It is quite possible that the theater of the war may be approaching us." ....

"Ha! ha! ha! the theater of war!" exclaimed the prince. "I have said, and I still say, that the theater of the war is in Poland, and the enemy will never venture to cross the Niemen."

Dessalles looked in amazement at the prince, who spoke of the Niemen when the enemy was already at the Dnieper; but the Princess Mariya, who had forgotten the geographical position of the Niemen, supposed that what her father said was correct.

"As soon as the snow begins to thaw they will be swallowed up in the swamps of Poland. Only they cannot see it," pursued the old prince, evidently thinking of the campaign of 1807, which, as it seemed to him, had not been so long ago. "Benigsen ought to have marched into Prussia before this; then the affair would have taken another direction." ....

"But, prince," timidly suggested Dessalles, "Vitebsk is mentioned in the letter." ....

"Ah! in the letter!.... Yes...." involuntarily exclaimed the prince. "Yes.... yes...." His face had suddenly assumed a sour expression. He paused for a moment. "Yes, he writes that the French were beaten.... near some river.... what was it?"

Dessalles dropped his eyes. "The prince wrote nothing about that," said he, in a low tone. "Did n't he, indeed! Well, I certainly did not imagine it!"

A long silence ensued.

"Yes.... yes.... Well, Mikhaïl Ivanuitch!" he suddenly exclaimed, raising his head and pointing at the plan of the new building. "Tell me how you propose to change this...." Mikhaïl Ivanuitch drew up to the table, and the prince, after discussing the plan of the new edifice, left the room, casting an angry glance on the Princess Mariya and Dessalles.

The princess noticed Dessalles's confused and wondering look fastened on her father, remarked his silence, and was dumfounded at her father having forgotten to take his son's letter from the drawing-room table; but she was afraid to speak or to ask Dessalles the cause of his confusion and silence, and she was afraid even to think what it might be.

In the evening, Mikhaïl Ivanuitich was sent by the prince for his son's letter, which had been forgotten in the drawing-room. The Princess Mariya handed him the letter. And, although it was a trying thing for her to do, she permitted herself to ask him what her father was doing.

"He is always busy," replied Mikhaïl Ivanuitich, with a polite but sarcastic smile which made the Princess Mariya turn pale. "He is very much interested in the new building. He has been reading a little, but just now," continued Mikhaïl Ivanuitich, lowering his voice, "he is at his desk; he must be working over his 'will.'"

Latterly, one of the prince's favorite occupations had been to arrange the papers which were to be left after his death, and which he called his "will."

"And is he sending Alpatuitich to Smolensk?" asked the Princess Mariya.

"He is; he has been waiting for some time."

CHAPTER III

When Mikhaïl Ivanuitich returned to the cabinet, he found the prince sitting at his open bureau, with his spectacles on and his eyes shaded by an abat-jour. He was reading by the light of a shaded candle and with a peculiarly solemn expression, holding very far from his eyes the manuscript—his Remarks, he called it—which he wished to have presented to the sovereign after his death.

When Mikhaïl Ivanuitich came in, the old prince's eyes were filled with tears, started by the recollection of the time when he had written what he was now reading. He snatched the letter from Mikhaïl Ivanuitich's hand, thrust it into his pocket, replaced the manuscript and summoned the long-waiting Alpatuitch.

He held a sheet of paper on which was jotted down what he wished to be done at Smolensk, and as he paced back and forth through the room past the servant standing at the door, he delivered his instructions.

"First,—do you hear?—letter-paper like this specimen, gilt-edged—here's the pattern so as not to make any mistake,—varnish,—sealing-wax,"—following Mikhail Ivanuitch's memorandum.

He paced up and down the room, and kept glancing at the memorandum of purchases.

"Then be sure to give this letter about the deed to the governor in person."

Then he laid special stress on getting the bolts for his new edifice, which must be of a special pattern invented by himself. Then a folio was wanted for holding his "will." It took more than two hours to charge Alpatuitch with all the commissions, and still the prince did not let him go. He sat down, tried to think, and, closing his eyes, fell into a doze. Alpatuitch stirred uneasily.

"Well, get you gone! get you gone! if I need anything more I will send for you."

Alpatuitch left the room. The prince went to the bureau again, glanced into it, touched the papers with his hand, closed it again, and, going to his table, sat down to write his note to the governor.

It was already late when, having sealed the letter, he got up. He wanted to go to bed, but he knew that he should not sleep, and that the most miserable thoughts would haunt him as soon as he lay down. He rang for Tikhon, and went with him through the rooms, so as to select the place where to set the bed for the night. He went about measuring every corner.

There was no place that seemed to please him, but anything was better than his usual divan in his cabinet. This divan was terrible to him, apparently on account of the trying thoughts which passed through his mind as he lay on it. There was no place that satisfied him, but he was best of all pleased with the corner in the divan-room behind the pianoforte; he had never before slept there.

Tikhon and a man-servant brought in the bedstead, and began to make the bed.

"Not that way! Not that way!" cried the prince, and with his own hand he pushed it an inch or two farther away from the corner, and then nearer again.

"Well, at last I have done everything; let me rest," thought the prince, and he commanded Tikhon to undress him.

Painfully scowling at the effort required to take off his kaftan and pantaloons, the prince at last got undressed, and let himself drop heavily on his bed, and then seemed lost in thought as he gazed scornfully at his yellow, shriveled legs. Thought, however, was absent; he was merely sluggish about undertaking the labor of lifting those same legs and getting them into bed.

"Okh! what a trial! Okh! why must the end of these labors be so slow in coming! Why can't you leave me in peace?" he said to himself. Screwing up his lips, he, for the twenty-thousandth time, made the effort, and then lay down. But he was scarcely on his back before the whole bed suddenly began, with slow and regular motion, to rock backward and forward, as if it were heavily breathing and tossing. This thing happened to him almost every night. He opened his eyes, which he had just closed.

"No repose! Curse it!" he exclaimed, full of fury against something. "Yes, yes! there must have been something else of importance, of very great importance, which I kept till I should go to bed. Was it the bolts? No, I told him about that. No, it was something that happened in the drawing-room. The Princess Mariya had some nonsense to repeat. Dessalles—that idiot!—made some remark. There was something in my pocket! I can't remember. .... Tishka! what were we talking about at dinner-time?"

"About Prince Mikhaïl...."
"Hold your tongue!"

The prince thumped his hand on the table. "Now, I know.... it was Prince Andrei's letter. The Princess Mariya read it aloud. Dessalles said something about Vitebsk. Now, I will read it."

He bade Tikhon fetch him the letter from his pocket, and place a small table near the bed, with his lemonade and a wax taper, and, putting on his spectacles, he began to read. There only, as he read the letter, in the silence of the night, by the feeble light of the candle under the green shade, he for the first time for a moment took in its full significance.

"The French at Vitebsk! in four marches they can reach Smolensk; maybe they are there now. Tishka!"

Tikhon sprang forward. "No matter! Nothing! nothing!" he cried.

He slipped the letter under the candlestick, and closed his eyes.

And there arose before him the Danube, — a brilliant noonday, — the rushes, — the Russian camp and himself, a young general with not a single wrinkle on his face: hale and hearty, gay and ruddy, going into Potemkin's bright-colored tent, and the burning feeling of hatred against the "favorite" stirs in him now as violently as it did even then. And he recalls all the words which were spoken at his first interview with Potemkin. And his fancy brings up before him again a stout, short woman, with a fat, sallow face, — matushka-imperatritsa, — the little mother empress, — her smile, her words of flattery, when she for the first time gave him audience, and he remembers her face as it appeared on the catafalque, and then the quarrel with Zubof, which took place over her coffin, over the right to approach her hand.

"Akh! would that those old times could return, and that the present would all come to an end .... soon.... soon .... that I might at last find rest!"
Luisiya Gorui, Prince Nikolai Andreyitch Bolkonsky's estate, was situated about sixty versts from Smolensk and three versts from the Moscow highway.

That evening, while the prince was giving Alpatuitch his commissions, Dessalles asked for a few moments' talk with the Princess Mariya, and told her that as the prince, her father, was not very well, and refused to adopt any measures for their safety, while from Prince Andrei's letter it was evident that to remain at Luisiya Gorui was attended with danger, he respectfully advised her to send a letter by Alpatuitch to the nachalnik of the government at Smolensk, asking him to let her know the real state of affairs, and the measure of danger to which Luisiya Gorui was exposed.

Dessalles wrote the letter for her to the governor, and she signed it, and it was put into Alpatuitch's hands with strict injunctions to hand it to the governor, and in case the danger were urgent to return as soon as possible.

Having received all his instructions, Alpatuitch, in a white beaver hat, — a gift of the prince's, — with a cudgel exactly like that carried by the prince, went, escorted by all the servants, to get into the leather-covered kibitka, to which a troika of fat, roan steeds had been attached.

The duga-bell was tied up, and the little harness bells were stuffed with paper. The prince would not allow bells to be used at Luisiya Gorui. But Alpatuitch liked the sounds of them on a long journey. His fellow-servants, the zemsky, or communal scribe, the house clerk, the pastry cook, and the scullery maid, two old women, a young groom, the coachman, and a number of other household serfs accompanied him.

His daughter stuffed back of the seat and under it some down cushions covered with chintz. His wife's sister, an old woman, stealthily thrust in a small bundle. One of the coachmen helped him to get to his place.
"Well, well! women's fussiness! Oh! women, women!" he exclaimed, puffing and speaking in the same short, hurried way as the old prince did; and he took his place in the kibitka. Having given his last orders to the zemsky in regard to the work, Alpatuitch removed his hat from his bald head and crossed himself thrice — and in this respect he certainly did not imitate the prince.

"If anything should.... you.... you will hurry back, Yakof Alpatuitch; for Christ's sake, have pity on us!" screamed his wife, with a covert reference to the rumors of the war and the enemy.

"Oh, women, women! women's fussiness!" growled Alpatuitch to himself, and he rode away, glancing around him at the fields, some of which were covered with yellowing rye, others with thick crops of oats still green, others black where the men were just beginning to do the second plowing. He rode on, admiring the summer wheat, which gave an unusually abundant crop that year; then he gazed with delight at the rye-fields, where the reapers were already beginning to work, and he made mental calculations as to future sowing and gathering of crops, and wondered if he had forgotten any of the prince's commissions.

Having stopped twice on the road to bait his horses, Alpatuitch, on the sixteenth of August, reached the city.

On the way he met and passed wagon-trains and detachments of troops. As he approached Smolensk, he heard the sounds of distant firing, but these reports did not surprise him. He was more surprised than at anything else to see, in the vicinity of the city, tents pitched in the midst of a magnificent field of oats, which some soldiers were mowing apparently for the sake of fodder; this circumstance surprised Alpatuitch, but it quickly slipped his mind, which was absorbed in his own business.

All the interests of Alpatuitch's life had been for more than thirty years confined to fulfilling the prince's wishes, and he had never taken a step outside of this narrow circle. Everything that did not appertain to carrying out the prince's directions did not interest him, and might be said not even to exist for Alpatusitch.

Arriving on the evening of August sixteenth at Smolensk, Alpatusitch put up at an inn, kept by the dvornik Ferapontof, across the Dnieper, in the Gachensky suburb, where he had been in the habit of making his headquarters for the past thirty years. Ferapontof, thirty years before, had, with the connivance\(^1\) of Alpatusitch, bought a piece of woodland of the prince, and begun to trade, and now he had a home of his own, a tavern, and a grain-shop in the province. Feropontof was a stout, dark-complexioned, good-looking muzhik, of middle age, with thick lips, and a thick, knobbled nose, and with knobs over his black, scowling brows, and with a portly belly.

Ferapontof was standing at the street-door of his shop, in his colored chintz shirt and waistcoat. Catching sight of Alpatusitch, he came out to meet him.

"Welcome, Yakof Alpatusitch. The people are leaving town, and here you are coming to town!" exclaimed the landlord.

"What do you mean? Leaving town?" asked Alpatusitch.

"I mean what I say. The people are fools. They're all afraid of a Frenchman!"

"Woman's chatter! woman's chatter!" grumbled Alpatusitch.

"That's my opinion, Yakof Alpatusitch. I tell 'em there's orders not to let him in; so, of course, he won't get in. And yet those muzhiks ask three rubles for a horse and cart. That is n't Christian of 'em!"

Yakof Alpatusitch paid little attention to what he said. He asked for a samovar, and some hay for his horses, and, after he had sipped his tea, he went to bed.

All night long the troops went tramping by the tavern along the street. The next morning Alpatusitch put on his kamzol, which he always wore only in town, and set forth to do his errands. The morning was sunny, and at eight o'clock it was already hot. A fine day for the wheat-harvest, as Alpatuitch considered. Beyond the city the sounds of firing had been audible since early morning. About eight o'clock a heavy cannonading made itself heard in addition to the musketry.

\(^1\) Legkaya ruka: literally, 'light hand.'

The streets were crowded with people hurrying to and fro; there were many soldiers; but, just as usual, izvoshchiks were driving about, merchants were standing at their shop doors, and the morning service was going on in the churches.

Alpatuitch did his errands at the shops, at the government offices, at the post-office, and at the governor's. At the government offices, at the shops, at the post-office, everywhere, every one was talking of the war and the enemy, who was even now making his descent upon the city. Every one was asking every one else what was to be done, and every one was trying to reassure every one else.

At the governor's house, Alpatuitch found a great throng of people, Cossacks, and a traveling carriage belonging to the governor. On the doorstep Yakof Alpatuitch met two of the local gentry, one of whom he knew. The nobleman whom he knew, a former ispravnik, or district captain of police, was talking with some heat.

"But I tell you this is no joke!" he was saying. "It's very well for a man who is alone. One can endure to be single and poor; but to have thirteen in your family, and your whole property at stake!.... What do the authorities amount to if they let such things come on us? Ekh! they ought to hang such cutthroats...."

"There, there! they'll hear you!" said the other.

"What difference does it make to me; let them hear! Why, we are not dogs!" said the ex-ispravnik, and, looking round, he caught sight of Alpatuitch:—

"Ah! Yakof Alpatuitch, what brings you here?"

"On an errand from his illustriousness to the governor," replied Alpatuitch, proudly lifting his head, and placing his hand in the breast of his coat—which he always did when he remembered the prince. "He sent me to ascertain the position of affairs," said he.

"Well, then, ascertain it," cried the proprietor. "Not a cart to be had — nothing!.... There, do you hear that?" he exclaimed, calling their attention to the direction in which the firing could be heard. "That's the pass they've brought us to! ruining us all.... the cutthroats!" he muttered again, and turned down the steps.

Alpatuitch shook his head, and went up-stairs. In the reception-room were merchants, women, chinovniks, silently exchanging glances. The door into the governor's cabinet was opened, and all stood up and crowded forward. Out of the room hurried a chinovnik, exchanged some words with a merchant, beckoned to a stout chinovnik, with a cross around his neck, to follow him, and again disappeared behind the door, evidently avoiding all the glances and questions that followed him.

Alpatuitch pressed forward, and, when the chinovnik came out again, placing his hand under the breast of his overcoat, he addressed the official, and handed him the two letters.

"For the Baron Asch, from General-in-Chief Prince Bolkonsky," he said, so solemnly and significantly that the chinovnik turned round to him and took the letters. At the end of a few moments the governor summoned Alpatuitch, and said to him hurriedly:

"Inform the prince and the princess that I knew nothing about it at all. I have been acting in accordance with superior instructions. — Here!"....

He gave a paper to Alpatuitch.

"However, as the prince is ill, my advice to him is to go to Moscow. I am going there myself.... immediately. Tell him...."

But the governor did not finish his sentence; an officer, breathless and covered with sweat, came rushing in, and hurriedly said something in French. An expression of horror crossed the governor's face.

"Go," said he, nodding to Alpatuitch; and then he began to ply the officer with questions. Pitiful, frightened, helpless glances followed Alpatuitch as he came out of the governor's cabinet. Involuntarily listening now to the cannonading, constantly growing nearer and more violent, Alpatuitch hastened back to the inn.

The paper which the governor had given him was as follows:

I assure you that the city of Smolensk is not in the slightest danger, and it is entirely unlikely that it will be threatened. I, on the one hand, and Prince Bagration, on the other, shall effect a junction before Smolensk; and this will take place on the 2d instant, and the two armies, with united forces, will defend their fellow-countrymen of the government committed to your charge, until their efforts shall have driven away the foes of the fatherland, or until the last warrior shall have perished from their gallant ranks. You will see from this that you have a perfect right to calm the inhabitants of Smolensk, since any one defended by two such brave armies may well be confident that victory will be theirs.¹

The inhabitants were roaming restlessly about the streets.

Teams, loaded to repletion with domestic utensils, chairs, clothes-presses, and furniture of every description, were coming out of the courtyard gates of the houses and proceeding along the streets. At the house next Ferapontof's stood a number of teams, and the women were bidding one another good-by, and exchanging parting gossip. The house-dog was barking and frisking around the heads of the horses.

Alpatuitch, with a brisker gait than he usually took, went into the courtyard and proceeded directly to the barn where his team and horses were. The coachman was asleep; he aroused him, told him to hitch up, and went into the house. In the landlord's room were heard the wailing of a child, the broken sobs of a woman, and Ferapontof's furious, harsh tones. The cook, fluttering about the bar-room like a frightened hen, cried as soon as she saw Alpatuitch:

"He's been beating her to death.... been beating

¹ Order of the day, from Barclay de Tolly to Baron Asch, the civil governor of Smolensk, 1812.
the missis!.... He just beat her, and dragged her round!”....

“What made him do it?” asked Alpatuitch.

“She begged him to go! Just like a woman! ‘Take us away,’ says she, ‘don’t let ’em kill me and the little ones; everybody,’ says she, ‘s going, and why,’ says she, ‘should n’t we go too?’ And so he began to beat her. He just thrashed her and dragged her round!”

Alpatuitch nodded his head as if he approved, and, not caring to hear any more about it, went to the room where his purchases had been left. It was opposite the landlord’s family room.

“You villain, you wretch!” at this moment cried a thin, pale woman, with a baby in her arms, and with a torn kerchief on her head, who came rushing out of that room, and flew down-stairs into the court.

Ferapontof came out behind her, and when he saw Alpatuitch, he pulled down his waistcoat, smoothed his hair, and followed Alpatuitch into the room.

“And so you are going so soon?” he asked.

Not paying any attention to this question, and not looking at the landlord, Alpatuitch, after making a bundle of his purchases, asked how much he should pay for the accommodation.

“We will settle that by and by. How was it at the governor’s?” asked Ferapontof. “What was the talk there?”

Alpatuitch replied that the governor had not said anything very decisive to him.

“How can we possibly get away with our things?” Why, they ask seven rubles to go to Dorogobuzh! And I tell you there’s mighty little Christianity about them!” said he. “Selivanof made a good thing Thursday, sold some flour to the army at nine rubles a sack. Say, will you drink some tea?” he added.

While the horses were being put to, Alpatuitch and Ferapontof sipped their tea and talked about the price of wheat, about the crops, and the splendid weather for harvest.
"Well, it seems to be calming down a little," said Ferapontof, getting up after his three cups of tea. "Ours must have had the best of it. They told us they would not let 'em in. Of course we're strong enough. They say Matvyer Ivanuitch Platof drove eighteen thousand of 'em into the Marina t'other day and drowned 'em all."

Alpatuitch picked up his purchases and gave them to the coachman, who came in; then he settled his account with the landlord. The sound of carriage-wheels was heard outside the door, the trampling of the horses, and the jingling of bells, as the kibitka drove up.

By this time it was far into the afternoon. One side of the street was in shadow; the other was brightly lighted by the sun. Alpatuitch glanced out of the window, and went to the door. Suddenly he heard the strange sound of a distant whizzing, and a dull thud, immediately followed by the long reverberating roar of a cannon, which made the windows rattle.

Alpatuitch went out into the street; a couple of men were running down toward the bridge. In various directions could be heard the whistling and crashing of round shot, and the bursting of bombshells falling into the city. But these sounds attracted little attention among the citizens compared with the roar of the cannonading heard beyond the city. This was the bombardment which Napoleon commanded to be opened at five o'clock, from one hundred and thirty cannon. The people at first did not realize the significance of this bombardment. The crash of falling shells and cannon-balls at first wakened only curiosity. Ferapontof's wife, who had been steadily wailing and weeping in the barn, dried her tears, and came out to the gates with her baby in her arms, and gazed silently at the people and listened to the noise.

The cook and the shop-tender came down to the gates. All looked with eager curiosity at the projectiles flying over their heads. Around the corner came several men, talking with great animation.
"What force there was!" one was saying. "Smashed the roof and the ceiling all into kindling-wood."

"And it plowed up the ground just like a hog!" said another.

"It was a good shot! Lively work!" said he, with a laugh.

"You had to look out mighty sharp and jump, else 't would have smeared you!"

The people gathered round these men. They stopped and told how shots had been falling into a house near them. Meantime, other projectiles, now round shot, with a pleasant whistling, now shells, with a swift, melancholy hissing, kept flying over the heads of the people. But not a single projectile fell near them; all flew over and beyond. Alpatuitch took his seat in his kibitka. The landlord was standing at his gates.

"You are showing too much!" he cried to the cook, who, with sleeves rolled up above her bare elbows, and holding up her red petticoat, had gone down to the corner to hear the news.

"But it was miraculous," she was just saying, but when she heard the sound of the landlord's voice she turned round and let her petticoat drop.

Once more, but very near this time, came something with a whistling sound, like a bird flying toward the ground; there was a flash of fire in the middle of the street, a loud, stunning crash, and the street was filled with smoke.

"You rascal, what did you do that for?" cried the landlord, rushing down to the cook.

At the same instant, the pitiful screaming of women was heard on various sides; a child wailed in terror, and the people gathered in silence with pale faces round the cook. Above all other sounds were heard the groans and exclamations of the cook.

"Oi-o-okh! my darlings! my poor darlings! Don't let them kill me! My poor darlings!"

Five minutes later, not a soul was left in the street. The cook, whose thigh had been broken by a fragment of the bomb, was carried into the kitchen. Alpatuitch, his coachman, and Ferapontof's wife and children and the hostler, were cowering in the cellar, with ears alert.
The roar of cannon, the whistle of projectiles, and the pitiful groans of the cook, which overmastered all else, ceased not for a single instant. The landlord's wife rocked and crooned her infant at one moment, and at the next she would ask in a terrified whisper of all who came down into the cellar where her husband, who had remained in the street, was.
The shop-tender came down into the cellar, and reported that her husband had gone with the crowd to the cathedral to get the wonder-working icon of Smolensk.
Toward twilight, the cannonade began to grow less violent. Alpatuitch went out of the cellar and stood in the doorway. The evening sky, which before had been cloudless, was now shrouded in smoke. And through this smoke strangely shone the sickle of the young moon high in the west. After the cessation of the terrible roar of the cannon, silence fell upon the city, broken only by what seemed to be a constantly increasing rumble of hurrying steps, groans, distant shouts, and the cracking of flames. The cook's groaning had ceased. In two different directions, volumes of black smoke arose from the conflagrations and spread over the city. Soldiers in various uniforms, mixed all in together, no longer in orderly ranks, but like ants from a demolished ant-hill, came running and walking from various directions down the street. It seemed to Alpatuitch that some of them were making for Ferapontof's tavern.
Alpatuitch went down to the gates. A regiment marching in serried ranks and hurrying along blocked the street from side to side.
"The city is surrendered! Off with you! off with you!" cried an officer who noticed him, and then he turned to his soldiers: "Loot the yards if you want,"
he cried.
Alpatuitch went back to the tavern, and, summoning the coachman, bade him start away. Alpatuitch and the coachmen were followed by all Ferapontof's household. When they saw the smoke and the even flames of the burning buildings which now began to blaze up in the gathering gloom, the women, till now perfectly silent, suddenly unloosed their tongues as they looked at the conflagrations; as it were echoing them, rose similar lamentations at the other end of the street. Alpatuitch and the coachman, with trembling hands, straightened the tangled reins and traces under the shed.

As Alpatuitch drove out of the gates, he saw half a score of soldiers in Ferapontof's open shop, with loud discussion, engaged in filling bags and knapsacks with wheaten flour and sunflower seeds. Just at that time Ferapontof himself happened to come into his shop from the street. When he saw the soldiers, he started to give them some abuse; but suddenly paused, and, clutching his hair, he broke out into laughter that was like a lamentation.

“Take it all, boys. Don't leave any for those devils,” he cried, grasping the bags himself, and helping to fling them out into the street. Some of the soldiers, frightened, ran away; others still continued to fill their sacks. Seeing Alpatuitch, Ferapontof called to him:—

“It's all up with Roosha,”¹ he shouted. “Alpatuitch, it's all up with us! I myself helped set the fires. .... All ruined!”

Ferapontof started into the courtyard.

The passing regiments so completely blocked the street that Alpatuitch could not make his way along, and he had to wait. Ferapontof's wife and family also were seated in a telyega, waiting for a chance to get away.

Night had now fully come. The sky was studded with stars, and occasionally the young moon gleamed out from behind the billows of smoke. On the slope down towards the Dnieper, the teams of Alpatuitch and the landlord, which had at last been slowly advancing amid the ranks of soldiery and other equipages, were obliged to halt. A short distance from the cross-roads where the teams had halted, a house and some shops were burning on the side street. The fire was burning itself out. The flame would die down and lose itself in black smoke, then suddenly flash forth brilliantly again, bringing out with strange distinctness the faces of the spectators standing on the cross-roads. In front of the fire, the dark forms of men were darting to and fro, and above the still audible crackling of the fire were heard shouts and cries. Alpatuitch, dismounting from his kibitka, as he saw that he should not be able to proceed for some time yet, walked down the cross-street to look at the conflagration. Soldiers were constantly busying themselves with the fire, passing back and forth, and Alpatuitch saw two soldiers, in company with another man in a frieze coat, dragging from the fire some burning lumber across the street into the next dvor; others were adding fagots of straw.

¹ He calls it Rasseya instead of Rossiya.

Alpatuitch joined the great throng of people who were standing in front of a tall warehouse that was one mass of roaring flames. The walls were all on fire, the rear had fallen in, the timbered roof was giving way, the girders were blazing. The throng were evidently waiting for the roof to cave in. At all events, that was what Alpatuitch was waiting for.

"Alpatuitch!"

A well-known voice suddenly called the old man by name.

"Batyushka! your illustriousness!" replied Alpatuitch, instantly recognizing the voice of his young prince.

Prince Andrei, in a riding-cloak, and mounted on a black horse, was stationed beyond the crowd and looking straight at Alpatuitch.

"How are you here?" he asked.

"Your.... your illustriousness," stammered Alpatuitch, and he sobbed. "Your — your.... I — I.... is .... are we lost? Your father...."

"How are you here?" demanded Prince Andrei a second time.

The flame blazed out again at that moment and revealed to Alpatuitch his young barin's pale, weary face.
Alpatuitch told how he had been sent and what difficulty he had met with in getting out of town.

"But tell me, your illustriousness, are we really lost?" he asked once more.

Prince Andrei, without replying, drew out a notebook, and, spreading it on his knee, hastily penciled a few lines on a torn leaf. He wrote his sister:—

Smolensk is abandoned; Luisiya Gorui will be occupied by the enemy inside of a week. Go immediately to Moscow. Send me word as soon as you start, by an express to Usviazh.

Having written this note and handed it to Alpatuitch, he was giving him some verbal instructions about the arrangements for the journey of the prince and princess and his son and the tutor, and how and where to communicate with him immediately. He had not had time to finish these instructions when a mounted staff nachalnik accompanied by a suite came galloping up to him.

"You, a colonel?" cried the staff nachalnik in a German accent and a voice that Prince Andrei instantly recognized. "In your very presence they are setting houses on fire, and you allow it? What is the meaning of this? You shall answer for it!"

This was Berg, who now had the position of deputy chief of staff to the deputy chief of staff of the nachalnik of the infantry corps of the left flank of the first division of the army — a place which was very agreeable and "in sight," as Berg expressed it.

Prince Andrei glanced at him, and, without replying, went on with his instructions to Alpatuitch:—

"Tell them that I shall expect an answer by the twenty-second, and that if by the twenty-second I do not get word that they have all gone, I myself shall be obliged to throw up everything and go to Luisiya Gorui."

"I — prince, I only spoke as I did," exclaimed Berg, as soon as he recognized Prince Andrei, "because, because it is my duty to carry out my orders, and I am always very scrupulous in carrying them out. ... I beg you to excuse me," said Berg, trying to apologize.

1 Pomyeshchik nachalnika shtaba pomyeshchika nachalnika shtaba nachalnika Dljevava flanka pyekhotnikh voisk pyervoi armii.

There was a crash in the burning building. The fire for an instant died down; volumes of black smoke rolled up from the roof. Again there was a strange crashing sound in the fire and something enormous fell in.

"Urrooorooroo!" yelled the throng, with a roar rivaling that of the fallen grain-house, from which now came an odor like hot cakes, caused by the burning flour. The flames darted up and sent a bright reflection over the throng standing around the fire with gleefully excited or exhausted faces.

The man in the frieze coat waved his arm and cried:—

"Well done! she draws well now! Well done, boys!" ... "That's the owner himself," various voices were heard saying.

"So then," said Prince Andrei, addressing Alpatuitch, "give the message just as I have told you," and, not vouchsafing a single word to Berg, who silently stood near, he set spurs to his horse and rode down the side street.

CHAPTER V

The armies continued to retreat from Smolensk. The enemy followed. On the twenty-second of August the regiment which Prince Andrei commanded was moving along the highroad past the "prospekt" which led to Luisiya Gorui.

For more than three weeks there had been a hot spell and drought. Each day cirrus clouds moved across the sky and occasionally veiled the sun; but by evening the heavens were clear again, and the sun set in brownish purple haze. The only refreshing that the earth got was from the heavy dew at night. The standing crops of wheat were parched, and wasted their seed. The marshes dried up. The cattle bellowed from hunger, finding no pasturage along the ponds, which had shrunk to nothing in the sun. Only at night and in the depths of the forest, before the dew evaporated, was there any freshness.

But on the roads, on the highroad where the troops were marching, even at night, even in the shelter of the forests, this coolness was not to be found. The dew was imperceptible on the sandy dust, which was more than a quarter of an arshin deep.

At the first ray of dawn the troops were set in motion. The baggage train and the field-pieces plowed along noiselessly, sinking almost up to the hubs of the wheels, and the infantry struggled through the soft, stifling, heated dust which settled not even at night. One part of this sandy dust impeded feet and wheels; the other arose in the air and hovered like a cloud over the troops, filling eyes, hair, ears, and nostrils, and above all the lungs, of men and beasts alike as they moved slowly along this highway. The higher the sun rose, the higher rose this cloud of dust; and, though the sky was cloudless, the naked eye could endure to look at the sun through this curtain of fine hot dust.

The sun looked like a great purple ball. There was not a breath of air stirring, and the men suffocated in the motionless atmosphere. They tramped along, covering their noses and mouths with handkerchiefs. If they reached a village, they rushed pell-mell for the wells. They fought for water, and drank it every drop till nothing but mud was left.

Prince Andrei was the commander of the regiment, and deeply concerned in its organization and the well-being of his men, and the carrying out of the urgent orders which had to be given and received. The burning of Smolensk and its abandonment marked an epoch in his life. The new feeling of hatred against the enemy made him forget his own personal sorrow. He devoted himself exclusively to the affairs of his command; he was indefatigable in the service of his men and his subordinate officers, and was courteous to them. In the regiment they all called him "our prince"; they were proud of him and loved him.
But his kindness and affability were only for his own men—Timokhin and the like, men who were perfect strangers to him and his life, men who could not know him or recall his past; the moment he fell in with any of his former acquaintances, his fellow staff-officers, he immediately became all bristles; he grew fierce, sarcastic, and scornful. Everything that served as a connection with the past revolted him, and consequently in his relations with this former society he simply tried not to be unjust and to do his duty.

It is true, everything appeared to Prince Andreï gloomy and even desperate, especially after the eighteenth of August and the abandonment of Smolensk,—which in his opinion might and should have been defended—and after his sick father had been forced to fly to Moscow, and consign to spoliation his too-well-beloved Luisiya Gorui, which he had taken such pains to cultivate and settle; but, in spite of this, thanks to Prince Andreï's occupation with his regiment, he could let his mind be engrossed with other thoughts, entirely disconnected with the general course of events; namely, his regiment.

On the twenty-second of August the column of which his regiment formed a part was opposite Luisiya Gorui. Prince Andreï, two days before, had received word that his father, his little son, and his sister had gone to Moscow. Although there was nothing to call him to Luisiya Gorui, he determined that it was his duty to go there, feeling a peculiar morbid desire to enjoy the bitterness of his grief.

He ordered his horse to be saddled, and started off to ride to the estate where he had been born and had spent his childhood.

As he rode by the pond, where generally there were a dozen chattering women beating and rinsing their linens, Prince Andreï noticed that it was deserted, and the little float had drifted out into the middle of the pond, and was tipped over and half full of water. Prince Andreï rode up to the gatekeeper's lodge; but there was no one near the stone gateway, and the door was unlocked. The garden paths were already overgrown, and calves and horses were wandering about the "English park." Prince Andreï went to the orangery; the panes of glass were broken; some of the tubs were overturned; some of the trees were dried up.

He shouted to Taras, the gardener. No one replied. Passing around the orangery, he saw that the carved deal fence was broken down, and the plum trees were stripped of their fruit. An old muzhik — Prince Andreï had seen him in his childhood at the gates — was plaiting bast shoes as he sat on the green-painted bench.

He was deaf, and did not hear Prince Andreï approach. He was sitting on the bench which had been the old prince's favorite seat, and near him, on the branches of a broken and dried-up magnolia, hung his strips of bast.

Prince Andreï went to the house. Some of the linden trees in the old park had been felled; a piebald mare, with her colt, was browsing in front of the house itself, among the rose bushes. The window-shutters were closed. One window only, on the ground floor, was open. A little peasant lad, catching sight of Prince Andreï, ran into the house.

Alpatuitch, having got the household away, was the only one left at Luisiya Gorui. He was sitting in the house, and reading "The Lives of the Saints." When he heard that Prince Andreï had come, he came out, with his spectacles on his nose, buttoning up his clothes, and hurried up to the prince, and, before he said a word, burst into tears, kissing Prince Andreï's knee.

Then he turned away, angry at his own weakness, and began to give him an account of the state of affairs. Everything of any value and worth had been despatched to Bogucharovo. One hundred chetverts¹ of wheat had also been sent; the crops of hay and corn, which, according to Alpatuitch, had been wonderful that year, had been taken standing and carried off by the troops. The peasantry were all ruined; some had gone to Bogucharovo, a very few were left.

Prince Andreï, without heeding what he said, asked

¹ A chetvert is 5.77 bushels.
when his father and sister had left, meaning when they went to Moscow. Alpatuitch, supposing he knew that they had gone to Bogucharovo, replied that they had started on the nineteenth, and then again began to enlarge on the condition of the estate, and ask what arrangements he should make.

"Do you order to let them have the oats in return for a receipt? We have still six hundred chetverts left," said Alpatuitch.

"What answer shall I give him?" queried Prince Andreï, looking down at the bald head gleaming in the sun, and reading in the expression of his face a consciousness that the old man himself realized the incongruity of such questions, but asked them simply for the sake of drowning his own sorrow.

"Yes, do so," said he.

"If you will deign to notice the disorder in the garden," pursued Alpatuitch; "but it was impossible to prevent it: three regiments came and camped here for the night. The dragoons especially—I took down the rank and the name of the commander, so as to lodge a complaint."

"Well, but what are you going to do? Shall you remain if the enemy come?" asked Prince Andreï.

Alpatuitch, turning his face full on Prince Andreï, looked at him. And then suddenly, with a solemn gesture, he raised his hands to heaven. "He is my protector; His will be done!" he exclaimed.

A throng of muzhiks and household serfs came troop-ing across the meadow, and approached Prince Andreï with uncovered heads.

"Well, prashchaï—farewell," said Prince Andreï, bending down to Alpatuitch. "Escape yourself, take what you can, and tell the people to go to the Riazan property, or our pod-Moskovnaya."

Alpatuitch pressed up against his leg, and sobbed. Prince Andreï gently pushed him away, and, giving spurs to his horse, rode at a gallop down the driveway.

To all appearance as impassive as a fly on the face of a dear dead friend, still sat the old man, and thumped on his shoe-last. Two young girls, with their skirts full of plums, which they had gathered from the trees, were coming away from the orangery, and met Prince Andrei. When they saw their young barin, the older of the two girls, with an expression of terror on her face, seized her little companion by the hand, and the two hid behind a birch tree, without having time to gather up the green plums that had fallen from their skirts.

Prince Andrei, with a feeling of compunction, hastened to look the other way, so that they might think he had not seen them. He felt sorry to have frightened the pretty little girl. He was afraid to look at them, but, at the same time, he had an overwhelming desire to do so. A new, joyful, and tranquilizing sense took possession of him at the sight of these little girls; he recognized that there existed other human interests entirely apart from his, and yet just as lawful as those with which he was occupied. These two young girls had evidently only one passionate desire—to carry off and eat those green plums, and not be found out; and Prince Andrei sympathized with them, and hoped for the success of their enterprise. He could not refrain from looking back at them once more.

Supposing that their peril was happily past, they had sprung out from their hiding-place, and, shouting something in shrill voices, they were running gayly across the meadow as fast as their bare, sun-burned little legs would take them.

Prince Andrei felt somewhat refreshed by his digression from the dusty highroad, where the troops had been marching. But not very far from Luisiya Gorui he again struck the main thoroughfare, and found his own regiment halting on the embankment of a small pond.

It was about two o'clock in the afternoon. The sun, shining through the dust like a red ball, was unendurably hot, and burned his back under his black coat. The dust still hung like a cloud over the companies while they halted amid a hum of voices. There was no wind. As Prince Andrei rode along the embankment, he caught the faint scent of the mud and fresh coolness of the pond. He felt an inclination to take a plunge into the water, muddy as it was. He gazed at the pond, from which rose the sounds of shouts and laughter. The little sheet, muddy, and green with slime, had evidently risen an inch or two, and was now washing up against the embankment, simply because it was full of human bodies, — the bare bodies of soldiers floundering about in it, their white skins making vivid contrast to their brick-red arms, faces, and necks. All this mass of bare human flesh was wriggling about, with shouts and laughter, in that filthy water, like carps flopping in a scoop. This wriggling carried the name of enjoyment, and for that very reason it was particularly melancholy.

One light-complexioned young soldier — Prince Andrei had already noticed him — of the third company, with a leather string around his calf, crossed himself, stepped back a little so as to get a good start, and dived into the water; another man, a dark-complexioned non-commisioned officer, with rumpled hair, was up to his middle in the water, ducking his muscular form, and, snorting joyfully, was pouring the water over his head from hands black even to the wrists. There was a sound of splashing and yelling and grunting.

On the shores, on the embankment, in the pond itself, everywhere, was the spectacle of white, healthy, muscular human flesh. The officer, Timokhin, with his short, red nose, was rubbing himself down with a towel on the embankment, and was rather ashamed at seeing the prince; however, he addressed him: —

"Pretty good, your illustriousness; you ought to try it," said he.

"Dirty," said Prince Andrei, making up a face.

"We will have it cleared out for you, in a moment." And Timokhin, still undressed, ran down to the water, shouting, "The prince wants a bath."

"What prince? Ours?" shouted various voices, and all were so zealous that Prince Andrei had some difficulty in appeasing them. He felt that he would much rather take a bath in a barn.
“Flesh, body! cannon-meat!” said he to himself, as he looked down at his bare body, and he trembled, not so much from chill as from his aversion and horror, incomprehensible even to himself, at the sight of that monstrous mass of bodies rinsing themselves in that filthy pond.

On the nineteenth of August, Prince Bagration, at his encampment of Mikhaïlovko on the Smolensk highway, had written the following letter to Arakcheyef; but he knew that it would be read by the sovereign, and, consequently, he weighed every word to the very best of his ability:

MY DEAR COUNT ALEKSEI ANDREYEVITCH:—I suppose the minister has already reported to you concerning the surrender of Smolensk to the enemy. It is saddening and painful, and the whole army are in despair that such an important place should have been abandoned to no purpose. I, for my part, personally besought him most earnestly, and at last even wrote him. I swear on my honor that never before was Napoleon "in such a box," and he might have lost half of his army, but he could not have taken Smolensk. Our troops have been and still are fighting as never before. I held out with fifteen thousand men for more than thirty-five hours, and beat them, but he was not willing to wait even fourteen hours. It is a shame and a blot on our army, and methinks he ought not to live in this world. If he reports that our losses are heavy, it is false—possibly four thousand, not more than that; even if it had been ten thousand, what would it have been? This is war. But, to offset it, the enemy lost a host.

What was to prevent him holding out two days longer? Without question they would have been forced to give it up; they had no water for men and horses. He gave me his word that he would not give way, but suddenly he sent me word that he was going to desert the city by night. We cannot make war in such a way, and we shall soon be having the enemy at Moscow....

There is a rumor prevalent that you are contemplating peace. Peace? God forbid! After all our sacrifices, and after such an idiotic retreat, the idea of making peace! You will have all Russia against you, and we shall all be ashamed of wearing the Russian uniform. Since things have gone as far as they have, we must fight as long as Russia can, and so long as we have a man alive....

It is essential that one man and not two should have supreme command. Your minister is perhaps excellent in the ministry, but as a general it is not enough to say that he is bad! He is abominable! and yet in his hands is intrusted the fate of our whole country. ....

I assure you I am beside myself with vexation; forgive me for writing so frankly. It is plain to my mind that any one who advises peace, and approves of confiding the command of the troops to the minister, is no true friend to the sovereign, and wishes to involve us all in a common destruction. And so I write you the truth. Arm the militia! Here the minister, in the most masterly fashion, is conducting his guests to the capital.

Mr. Woltzogen, the flügel-adjutant, is giving the army great cause for suspicion. They say he is even less favorable to us than Napoleon himself, and that he inspires all that the minister does.

I am not merely polite to him, I am as obedient as a corporal, although I am older than he is. It is painful, but, as I love my sovereign and benefactor, I submit. Only I am sorry that the sovereign should intrust him with such a glorious army. Imagine! In our retreat we have lost more than fifteen thousand through fatigue and in hospitals; now, if we had attacked the enemy, this would not have happened. For God's sake, tell me what will our Russia—our mother—say? She will ask why we are such cowards, and why we have handed over such a good and glorious country to villains, and why we stir up hatred and humiliation in the heart of every subject. What should make us cowards? Whom do we fear? It is not my fault that the minister is irresolute, cowardly, dull of apprehension, dilatory, and has all the worst qualities. The whole army is entirely discouraged, and load him with execrations.

CHAPTER VI

Among the numberless subdivisions into which the phenomena of life may be disposed, you may place them all in a category where substance predominates, or into another where form predominates. A contrast of this kind may be observed between life in the country, in the village, in the governmental town—nay, even in Moscow, and that which can be seen at Petersburg, and especially in the Petersburg salons. This sort of life goes on always the same.

Since 1805 we had been quarreling and making up with Bonaparte; we had been making constitutions and unmaking them, but Anna Pavlovna's salon and Ellen's salon were exactly the same as they had been seven years before and five years before. Just exactly as before, at Anna Pavlovna's, they were amazed and perplexed at Bonaparte's successes, and detected, not only in his successes, but also in the subservience of the sovereigns of Europe, a wicked conspiracy, the sole object of which was to disgust and alarm the courtly circle that regarded Anna Pavlovna as its representative.

And just exactly the same way at Ellen's (where Rumyantssof himself was gracious enough to be a frequent visitor, considering her a remarkably intelligent woman), in 1812 as in 1808, they talked with enthusiasm of the "great nation" and the "great man," and regretted the rupture with the French, which in the opinion of the habitués of Ellen's salon ought to end with peace.

Latterly, since the sovereign's departure from the army, these rival clique-salons were the scenes of some excitement; and demonstrations of mutual hostility were made, but the general characteristics of the two cliques remained the same.

Anna Pavlovna's clique received no Frenchmen, except a few inveterate legitimists. It was here originated the patriotic idea of people being in duty bound to stay away from the French theater, and the criticism was made that it cost as much to maintain the troupe as to maintain a whole army corps. Here the course of military affairs was eagerly followed, and the most advantageous reports of our armies found ready credence.

In Ellen's clique, where Rumyantssof and the French were in favor, the reports as to the barbarities of the enemy and of the war were contradicted, and all Napo-Leon’s overtures for reconciliation were discussed. In this clique they reproached those who showed what they considered too great haste in making preparations to remove to Kazan, the “Imperial Institute for the education of young ladies of the nobility,” the patroness of which was the empress-dowager. As a rule those who frequented Ellen’s salon regarded the war merely as an empty demonstration, which would be very quickly followed by peace, and here they made great use of a witticism of Bilibin’s,—who was now a frequent visitor at Ellen’s, as indeed it behooved every clever man to be,—to the effect that the affair should be settled not by gunpowder, but by the man who invented it.\footnote{Il n’a pas inventé la poudre: He will never set the Thames on fire. The Russian idiom is similar.}

This clique in an ironical, witty, though always guarded, manner made sport of the enthusiasm at Moscow, news of which had arrived at Petersburg simultaneously with the return of the sovereign.

Anna Pavlovna’s clique, on the contrary, were enraptured with this enthusiasm, and spoke of the acts of the Moscovites as Plutarch speaks of the glorious deeds of antiquity.

Prince Vasili, who, just the same as of yore, held important functions, formed a bond of union between the two cliques.

He was equally at home with ma bonne amie, Anna Pavlovna, and in the salon diplomatique de ma fille; and frequently, owing to his constant visits from one camp to the other, he got confused, and said at Ellen’s what he should have said at Anna Pavlovna’s, and vice versa.

Shortly after the sovereign’s arrival, Prince Vasili was at Anna Pavlovna’s, conversing about the war, sharply criticizing Barclay de Tolly, and frankly confessing his doubt as to the fit person to call to the head of the armies.

One of the visitors, who was known as the man of great merit, mentioning the fact that he had that day seen Kutuzof, the newly appointed chief of the Petersburg militia, at the Court of Exchequer, enrolling volunteers, allowed himself cautiously to suggest that Kutuzov—would be the man to satisfy all demands.

Anna Pavlovna smiled sadly, and remarked that Kutuzov caused the sovereign nothing but unpleasantness.

"I have said, and I have said in the chamber of nobles," interrupted Prince Vasili, "but they would not heed me,—I have said that his election as commandant of the militia would not please the sovereign. They would not listen to me. It is this everlasting mania for petty intrigue," pursued Prince Vasili. "And for what purpose? Simply because we want to ape that stupid Moscow enthusiasm," said Prince Vasili, becoming confused for a moment, and forgetting that it was at Ellen's where it was considered correct to make sport of Moscow enthusiasm, but the fashion to praise it at Anna Pavlovna's. But he instantly corrected himself.

"Now, then, is it fit for Count Kutuzof, Russia's oldest general, to be holding such sessions at the court? and that's as far as he will get. Is it possible to make a man commander-in-chief who cannot sit a horse, who dozes during council meetings,—a man of the worst possible manners? He won a fine reputation for himself at Bukarest! And I have nothing to say about his qualities as a general; but is it possible, under present circumstances, to nominate to such a place a man who is decrepit and blind, simply blind? A blind general would be a fine thing! He can't see anything at all! He might play blind-man's-buff—but, really, he can't see anything!"

No one raised any objection to this.

On the fifteenth of August this was perfectly correct. But, five days later, Kutuzof was made a prince. This advance in dignities might also signify that they wanted to shelve him, and, therefore, Prince Vasili's criticism would continue to be well received, although he was not so eager to deliver himself of it. But, on the twentieth of August, a committee was summoned, composed of Field-Marshal Saltuikof, Arakcheyef, Viazmitinof, Lopukhin, and Kotchubey, to consider the con duct of the war. The committee decided that the failures were attributable to the division of command; and, although the individuals composing the committee well knew the sovereign's dislike of Kutuzof, they determined, after a brief deliberation, to place him at the head of the armies.

And, on that same day, Kutuzof was made plenipotentiary commander-in-chief of the armies, and of the whole district occupied by the troops.

On the twenty-first, Prince Vasili and "the man of great merit" met again at Anna Pavlovna's. "The man of great merit" was dancing attendance on Anna Pavlovna, with the hope of securing the appointment of trustee to a woman's educational institute.

Prince Vasili entered the drawing-room with the air of a rejoicing conqueror who had reached the goal of all his ambitions.

"Well, you know the great news: Prince Kutuzof is appointed field-marshal. All discords are at an end! I am so happy, so glad!" exclaimed Prince Vasili. "There's a man for you!" he added, with significant emphasis, surveying all in the room with a stern glance.

"The man of great merit," in spite of his anxiety to obtain a place, could not refrain from reminding Prince Vasili of his former criticism. This was an act of discourtesy both toward Prince Vasili, in Anna Pavlovna's drawing-room, and toward Anna Pavlovna herself, who had also been greatly delighted with the news; but he could not refrain.

"But it is said that he is blind, prince," he suggested, quoting Prince Vasili's own words.

"Oh, pshaw! he sees well enough," replied Prince Vasili, in quick, deep tones, and clearing his throat—with the same voice and the same clearing of the throat which he always used in getting himself out of an awkward situation. "Certainly he sees well enough," he repeated. "And what makes me glad," he went on to say, "is that the sovereign has given him full powers over all the forces, and over the whole district—such powers as never commander-in-chief enjoyed before. This makes him the second autocrat," he said, in conclusion, with a triumphant smile.

"God grant it, God grant it," said Anna Pavlovna.

"The man of great merit," who was still somewhat of a novice in courtly circles, wishing to flatter Anna Pavlovna by taking the ground which she had formerly taken in regard to the same subject, said:—

"They say it went against the sovereign's heart to allow these powers to Kutuzof. They say that Kutuzof blushed like a school-girl hearing 'Joconde,' when the emperor said: 'The sovereign and your country confer this honor on you.'"

"Possibly his heart had nothing to do with it," said Anna Pavlovna.

"Oh, no, certainly not," hotly cried Prince Vasili, coming to his defense. He could not now allow any one to surpass him in his zeal for Kutuzof. According to his idea at the present time, not only was Kutuzof himself the best of men, but every one worshiped him. — "No, that is impossible, because his majesty long ago appreciated his worth," said he.

"Only, God grant," — ejaculated Anna Pavlovna,— "God grant that Prince Kutuzof may have actual power, and will not allow any one whatever to put a spoke in his wheels — des batons dans les roues."

Prince Vasili instantly understood whom she meant by any one. He said in a whisper:—

"I know for a certainty that Kutuzof demanded as an indispensable condition that the tsesarevitch should not have anything to do with the army. You know what he said to the emperor?" — and Prince Vasili repeated the words which it was supposed Kutuzof spoke to the sovereign, — 'I cannot punish him if he does wrong, or reward him if he does well.' Oh! he is a shrewd man, that Prince Kutuzof — I have known him for a long time."

"But they do say," insisted "the man of great merit," not as yet having the tact required at court,— "they do say that his serene highness made it a sine qua non that the sovereign himself should keep away from the army."

The moment he had spoken those words, Prince Vasili and Anna Pavlovna simultaneously turned their backs on him, and, with a sigh of pity for his simplicity, exchanged a melancholy look.

CHAPTER VII

While this was going on at Petersburg, the French had already left Smolensk behind, and were constantly drawing nearer and nearer to Moscow.

Thiers, the historian of Napoleon, like other historians of Napoleon, in trying to justify his hero; says that he was drawn on to the walls of Moscow against his will. He and all similar historians are correct in the assumption that the explanation of all historical events is to be found in the will of a single man. He is right, just as the Russian historians are right, who assert that Napoleon was lured on to Moscow by the skill of the Russian generals. Here, unless one goes according to the laws of retrospection, by which, from the vantage-ground of distance, all that is gone before is seen to be the preparation for a given event, everything will seem confused and complicated.

A good chess-player, on losing a game, becomes convinced that the cause of it was to be found in his own blunder, and he seeks to find what false move he made at the beginning of his game; but he forgets that at each step throughout the game there were similar blunders, so that not a single move of his was correct. The blunder to which he directs his attention he notices because his opponent took advantage of it. But how much more complicated is this game of war, which proceeds under the temporal conditions where it is impossible that a single will should animate the lifeless machine, but where everything results from the numberless collisions of various volitions!

After quitting Smolensk, Napoleon tried to force a battle near Dorogobuzh, at Viazma, then at Tsarevo-Zaïmishche; but it happened through these same "innumerable collisions of circumstances" that the Russians were unable to meet the French in battle until they reached Borodino, one hundred and twelve versts from Moscow. At Viazma, Napoleon issued his orders to march straight against Moscow: "Moscow, the Asiatic capital of this great empire, the sacred city of Alexander's populations, Moscow with its countless churches like Chinese pagodas."

This Moscow allowed Napoleon's imagination no rest. On the march from Viazma to Tsarevo-Zaïmishche, Napoleon rode his English-groomed bay amblcr, accompanied by his Guards, his body-guard, his pages, and his aides. His chief of staff, Berthier, had remained behind to interrogate a Russian who had been taken prisoner by the cavalry. And now, accompanied by his interpreter, Lelorme d'Ideville, he overtook Napoleon at a gallop, and with a beaming face reined in his horse. "Eh, bien?" asked Napoleon.

"One of Platof's Cossacks says Platof's corps is just joining the main army, that Kutuzof has been appointed commander-in-chief. Very intelligent and talkative."

Napoleon smiled, ordered this Cossack to be furnished with a horse and brought to him. He wished to have a talk with him. Several aides galloped off, and within an hour Denisof's serf, who had been turned by him over to Rostof, Lavrushka, in a denshchik's roundabout, came riding up to Napoleon on a French cavalryman's saddle, with his rascally, drunken face shining with jollity. Napoleon ordered him to ride along by his side, and proceeded to question him.

"You are a Cossack, are you?"

"I am, your nobility."

"The Cossack," says Thiers, in relating this episode, "not knowing his companion, for there was nothing in Napoleon's appearance that could suggest the presence of a sovereign to an Oriental imagination, conversed with the utmost familiarity concerning the occurrences of the war."

1 Zaïmishche means "a field frequently overflowed."
In reality, Lavrushka, who had been drunk the evening before and had failed to provide his barin with any dinner, had been thrashed and sent off to some village after fowls, and there he was tempted by his opportunity for marauding, and was taken prisoner by the French.

Lavrushka was one of those coarse, insolent lackeys who have seen every kind of life, who consider it to their advantage to do everything by treachery and trickery, who are ready to subserve their masters in anything, and are shrewd in divining their evil thoughts, especially those that are vain and petty.

Being brought now into the company of Napoleon, whom he was sharp enough to recognize, Lavrushka did not in the slightest degree lose his presence of mind, and merely set to work with all his soul to get into the good graces of his new masters.

He knew perfectly well that it was Napoleon himself, and there was no more reason for him to be abashed in Napoleon’s presence than in Rostof’s or the sergeant’s with his knout, for the simple reason that there was nothing of which either the sergeant or Napoleon could deprive him.

He glibly rattled off all the gossip that was current among the denshchiks. Much of this was true. But when Napoleon asked him whether the Russians anticipated winning a victory over Napoleon or not, Lavrushka frowned and deliberated.

Here he saw some subtile craft, just as men like Lavrushka always see craft in everything, and he contracted his brows and was silent for a little.

“This is about the way of it: if there’s a battle pretty soon,” said he, cautiously, “then yours will beat. That’s a fact. But if three days pass, and after that the same number, then if there’s a battle it’ll be a long one.”

This was interpreted to Napoleon as follows: “Si la bataille est donnée avant trois jours, les Français la gagneraient, mais que si elle serait donnée plus tard, Dieu sait ce qui en arriverait—If the battle takes place within three days, the French would win, but if it were postponed longer, Heaven knows what would come of it."

Thus it was delivered by Lelorme d'Ideville with a smile. Napoleon, though he was evidently in a genial frame of mind, did not smile, and ordered these words to be repeated.

Lavrushka noticed this, and, in order to amuse him, pretended that he did not know who he was.

"We know that you have Bonaparte on your side: he's whipped everybody on earth, but then he'll find us of a different mettle, ...." said he, himself not knowing how or why such boastful patriotism leaped to his tongue. The interpreter translated these words without curtailing them, and Napoleon smiled. "La jeune Cosaque fit sourire son puissant interlocuteur— The young Cossack's remark made his powerful companion smile," says Thiers.

After riding a few steps farther in silence, Napoleon spoke to Berthier and said that he would like to try the effect that would be produced on this son of the Don on learning that the man with whom he, this enfant du Don, had been conversing was the emperor himself, the very emperor who had written his immortally victorious name on the Pyramids.

The information was communicated.

Lavrushka, —comprehending that this had been done so as to embarrass him, and that Napoleon would expect him to show signs of fear,— and wishing to please his new masters, immediately pretended to be overwhelmed with astonishment and struck dumb; he dropped his eyes and made up a face as he usually did when he was led off for a thrashing.

Says Thiers: — "Hardly had Napoleon's interpreter revealed his name, ere the Cossack was overwhelmed with confusion; he did not utter another word and rode on with his eyes steadily fixed on that conqueror whose name had reached even his ears across the steppes of the East. All his loquacity was suddenly checked and gave place to unaffected, silent admiration. Napoleon, having rewarded him, set him at liberty, as a bird is restored to its native fields.”

Napoleon went on his way, dreaming of that Moscou which so enthralled his imagination, but “the bird restored to its native fields” galloped off to the picket lines, thinking up beforehand what sort of a romance he should tell his acquaintances. The thing that had actually happened to him he had no intention of telling, for the simple reason that it seemed to him unworthy of narration. He rode up to the Cossacks and made inquiries as to where he should find his regiment, which now formed a part of Platof’s division, and toward evening he reported to his barin, Nikolai Rostof, who was bivouacking at Yankovo and had just mounted in order to make with Ilyin a reconnaissance of the neighboring villages. He gave Lavrushka a fresh horse and took him with him.

CHAPTER VIII

The Princess Mariya was not at Moscow and out of harm’s way, as her brother supposed.

When Alpatuitch returned from Smolensk, the old prince seemed suddenly to wake, as it were, from a dream. He ordered the peasantry from his villages to be enrolled in the militia and armed, and wrote a letter to the commander-in-chief, informing him of his resolution to remain at Luisiya Gorui and defend himself till the last extremity, leaving it to his consideration whether to take measures or not for the defense of the place where one of the oldest of Russian generals proposed to be taken prisoner or to die. At the same time he announced to his household that he should remain at Luisiya Gorui.

1 À peine l’interprète de Napoléon avait-il parlé, que le Cosaque, saisi d’une sorte d’abaissement, ne proféra plus une parole, et marcha les yeux constamment attachés sur ce conquérant, dont le nom avait pénétré jusqu’à lui, à travers les steppes de l’orient. Toute sa loquacité s’était subitement arrêtée, pour faire place à un sentiment d’admiration naïve et silencieuse. Napoléon, après l’avoir récompensé, lui fit donner la liberté comme à un oiseau qu’on rend aux champs qui l’ont vu naître.
But, while he was determined to remain at Luisiya Gorui, he insisted that the princess with Dessalles and the young prince should go to Bogucharovo, and from there to Moscow. The princess, alarmed by her father’s feverish, sleepless activity so suddenly taking the place of his former lethargy, could not bring herself to leave him alone, and for the first time in her life permitted herself to disobey him. She refused to leave; and this drew upon her a terrific storm of fury from the prince. He brought up against her everything which he could find that was most unjust toward her. In his endeavors to incriminate her, he declared that she was a torment to him, that she had made him quarrel with his son, that she had harbored shameful suspicions of him, that she made it the task of her life to poison his life, and finally he drove her out of his cabinet, saying that if he never set eyes on her again, it would be all the same to him.

He declared that he would never have her name mentioned, and henceforth she might do what she pleased, but let her never dare to come into his sight again. The fact that, in spite of the Princess Mariya’s apprehensions, he did not order her to be carried away by main force, but simply forbade her to come into his sight, was a comfort to her. She knew this proved that in the secret depths of his heart he was glad of her determination to stay at home and not go.

On the morning of the day after Nikolushka’s departure, the old prince put on his full uniform and prepared to visit the commander-in-chief. The carriage was already at the door. The Princess Mariya saw him as he left the house in his uniform and all his orders and went down into the park to review his peasantry and household serfs under arms. The Princess Mariya sat at the window and listened to the tones of his voice echoing through the park. Suddenly a number of men came running from the avenue with frightened faces.

The Princess Mariya hastened down the steps, along the flower-bordered walk, and into the avenue. Here she was met by a great throng of the militia and the household serfs, and in the center of this throng several men were carrying the poor little veteran in his uniform and orders.

The Princess Mariya ran up to him, and, in the shifting play of the sunbeams falling in little circles through the linden boughs, and flecking the ground, she could not clearly make out what change had taken place in her father's face. The one thing that she noticed was that the former stern and resolute expression of his face had changed into an expression of timidity and submission. When he caught sight of his daughter, he moved his lips, but his words were unintelligible, and the only sound that came forth was a hoarse rattling. It was impossible to understand what he wished to say. They lifted him in their arms, carried him into his cabinet, and laid him on that divan which he had of late so dreaded.

The doctor who was summoned that same night took blood from him, and announced that paralysis had affected his right side.

As it grew more and more dangerous to remain at Luisiya Gorui, the day after the stroke the prince was removed to Bogucharovo. The doctor went with him.

When they reached Bogucharovo, Dessalles and the little prince had already started for Moscow.

For three weeks the old prince, helpless with paralysis, lay in the same condition, neither better nor worse, in the new house which his son had built at Bogucharovo. He was unconscious. He lay like a mutilated corpse. He kept muttering something with twitching brows and lips, but it was impossible to make out whether or not he realized what was going on around him.

The only thing that was certain was that he struggled and felt the necessity of saying something; but no one could divine whether it was the whim of a sick and semi-delirious man, or whether it referred to the general course of affairs, or whether it was in regard to the circumstances of the family.

The doctor insisted that there was no significance to be found in this restlessness, that it proceeded wholly from physical causes; but the Princess Mariya felt certain that he wished to say something to her, and the fact that her presence always increased his agitation confirmed her in this supposition.

He apparently suffered both physically and morally. There was no hope of his recovery. It was impossible to remove him. And what would have been done had he died on the road?

"Would not the end, would not death, be far better?" the Princess Mariya sometimes asked herself. She sat by him night and day, almost denying herself sleep; and, terrible to say, she often watched him closely, not with the hope of discovering symptoms of improvement, but rather with the wish that she might discover the approaching end.

Strange as it was for the princess to confess to this feeling, still it was there. And what was still more horrible for her was that since the illness of her father — even if it were not earlier, the time, say, when with some vague expectation she had elected to stay by him — all her long-forgotten hopes and desires seemed to wake and take possession of her once more. What she had long years ago ceased to think of — the thought of a life free from the terror of her father's tyranny, even the dream of love, and the possibility of family happiness — constantly arose in her imagination like the suggestions of the evil one.

No matter how strenuously she tried to put them all away, the thought would constantly arise in her mind how she would henceforth, after this was over, arrange her life. This was a temptation from the devil, and the Princess Mariya knew it. She knew that the only weapon against this was prayer, and she tried to pray. She put herself into the attitude of prayer, she looked at the holy pictures, she read the words of the breviary, but she could not pray. She felt that now she was going to be brought into contact with the world of life, of hard and yet free activity, so different, so wholly opposed to that moral world by which she had been hitherto surrounded, in which her best consolation had been prayer. She could not pray, could not weep, and the concerns of daily life occupied her.

It was becoming dangerous to remain at Bogucharovo. From every direction came rumors of the approach of the French, and in a village only fifteen versts from Bogucharovo a farm-house had been pillaged by French marauders.

The doctor insisted that it was necessary to get his patient farther away. The predvodityel, or marshal of the nobility, sent an officer to the Princess Mariya, urging her to get away as speedily as possible. The district-ispravnik, coming in person to Bogucharovo, insisted on the same thing, declaring that the French were only forty versts off, that the French proclamations were circulating among the villages, and that, if the princess did not get her father away by the twenty-seventh, he would not answer for the consequences.

The princess resolved to start on the twenty-seventh. The labors in preparation, the manifold orders which she had to give, as every one came to her for directions, kept her busy all day long. The night of the twenty-sixth she spent as usual, without undressing, in the room next to that occupied by the prince. Several times, aroused from her doze, she heard his hoarse breathing and muttering, the creaking of his bed, and the steps of Tikhon and the doctor as they turned him over. Several times she listened at the door, and it seemed to her that he muttered more distinctly than hitherto, and turned over more frequently. She could not sleep, and many times she went to the door and listened, wishing to go in, and yet not having the courage to do so. Although he could not tell her so, still she had seen and she knew how much he was annoyed by every expression of solicitude on his account. She had observed how he impatiently avoided her eyes, which she sometimes fixed on him, in spite of herself, full of anxiety. She knew that her intrusion at night, at such an unusual time, would annoy him.

But never before had she felt so sad, so terribly sad, at the thought of losing him. She recalled all her life with him, and discovered the expression of his love for her in his every word and every deed. Occasionally these recollections would be interrupted by those promptings of the devil, the thoughts of what would happen after he was gone, and how she would arrange her new life of freedom. But she dismissed such thoughts with loathing. Toward morning he became quieter, and she fell into a sound sleep.

She awoke late. The clear-sightedness which is a concomitant of our waking hours made her realize that her father's illness was the one predominant occupation of her life. As she woke up she listened for what was going on in the next room, and, hearing his hoarse breathing, she said to herself with a sigh that there was no change.

"But what should it be? What is it that I wish? I am looking forward to his death," she told herself, revolted at the very thought.

She changed her gown, made her toilet, said her prayers, and went out on the steps. In front of the door the carriages were standing without horses; a number of things had been already packed.

The morning was warm and hazy. The Princess Mariya was standing on the steps, her mind still full of horror at the thought of her moral depravity, and striving to bring some order into her mental state before going to him.

The doctor came down-stairs and approached her.

"He is better to-day," said he. "I was looking for you. You may be able to catch something of what he says. His mind is clearer. Come. He is calling for you."....

The Princess Mariya's heart beat so violently at this news that she turned pale and leaned up against the door lest she should fall. To see him, to speak with him, to come under the power of his eyes now when her soul had just been full of these terrible, criminal, sinful temptations was too painful a union of joy and horror.

"Come," said the doctor.

The princess went to her father's room and approached his bed. He was lying propped high up, with his small, bony hands covered with knotted purple veins resting on the counterpane, with his left eye straight as it always had been, and with his right eye drawn down, though now his brows and lips were motionless. He was the same little lean, weazened, pitiful old man. His face seemed all dried up or shriveled, his features without character. The Princess Mariya approached him and kissed his hand. His left hand gave her hand a returning pressure which made it evident he had been for some time expecting her. He held her hand, and his brows and lips moved impatiently.

She looked at him in terror, striving to divine what he wanted of her. When she changed her position and moved so that he could see her face with his left eye, he seemed satisfied and for several seconds did not let her out of his sight. Then his brows and lips quivered; he uttered sounds and began to speak, looking at her timidly and supplicatingly, evidently apprehensive that she would not understand him.

The Princess Mariya, concentrating all her powers of attention, looked at him. The comic difficulty he had in managing his tongue caused her to drop her eyes and made it hard for her to choke down the sobs that rose in her throat. He said something, several times repeating his words. The Princess Mariya could not understand them, but in her attempts to guess at what he said she uttered several sentences questioningly.

"Gaga.... boï.... boï...." he repeated several times. It was impossible to make any sense out of those sounds. The doctor thought that he had found the clue, and, trying to come the nearest to those sounds, asked: "Do you mean, Is the princess¹ afraid?"

He shook his head and again repeated the same sounds.

"His mind, his mind troubles him!"² suggested the princess. He uttered a sort of roar by way of affirmation, seized her hand and pressed it here and there on his chest, as if trying to find a place suitable for it to rest.

¹ Knyazhnya boïïa.
² Dusha, dusha bolit.

"Think .... all .... the time .... about .... thee," he then said far more distinctly than before,—now that he was persuaded that they understood him. The Princess Mariya bowed her head down to his hand to hide her sobs and tears.

He smoothed her hair.

"I was.... calling thee.... all night," he went on saying.

"If I had only known," said she, through her tears.

"I was afraid to come in."

He pressed her hand.

"Were you not asleep?"

"No, I was not asleep," replied the princess, shaking her head. Involuntarily falling under the influence of her father's condition, she now, in spite of herself, had to speak, as he did, more by signs, and almost found it difficult to manage her tongue.

"Darling,"¹—or did he say little daughter?—she could not tell,—but she was assured by his look that he had called her some affectionate, caressing name, which he had never before done,—"why did you not come in?"

"And I was wishing him dead, wishing him dead," thought the Princess Mariya.

He lay silent.

"Thank thee .... daughter, dearest .... for all .... for everything. .... Forgive. ....Thank thee .... forgive .... thank thee!"

And the tears trickled from his eyes.

"Call Andryusha," said he, suddenly, and, making this request, a childishly puzzled and distrustful expression came into his face. It seemed as if he himself knew that this request had no sense. So at least it seemed to the Princess Mariya.

"I have had a letter from him," replied the Princess Mariya. He gazed at her in puzzled amazement.

"Where is he?"

"He is with the army, mon père, at Smolensk."

¹ Dushenka (little soul), or Druzhok, diminutive of friend or love.
He closed his eyes and remained long silent. Then he opened his eyes and nodded his head affirmatively as if in answer to his own doubts, as much as to say that now he understood and remembered everything.

"Yes," said he, in a low but distinct voice. "Russia is ruined, lost! They have ruined her!"

And again he sobbed and the tears rolled down his cheeks. The Princess Mariya could no longer contain herself, and she also wept as she looked into his face.

He again closed his eyes. His sobs ceased. He made a gesture toward his eyes with his hand, and Tikhon, understanding what he meant, wiped away the tears.

Then he opened his eyes and made some remark which no one for some time understood; at last Tikhon made out what he had said, and said it over after him. The Princess Mariya had been trying to connect the sense of his words with what he had just before been speaking about. She thought he might be speaking of Russia, or of Prince Andrei, or of herself, or of his grandson, or of his own death. And consequently she could not make it out.

"Put on your white dress; I like it," was what he had said.

On hearing this, the Princess Mariya sobbed still more violently; and the doctor, taking her by the arm, led her from the room, out upon the terrace, telling her to calm herself and then finish the preparations for the departure. After his daughter had left him he again spoke about his son, about the war, about the sovereign, and scowled angrily, and tried to raise his hoarse voice, and then came the second and finishing stroke.

The Princess Mariya had remained on the terrace. The weather was now clear; it was sunny and hot. She found it impossible to realize anything, or to think of anything, or to feel anything, except her passionate love for her father, a love which, it seemed to her, she had never felt until that moment. She ran into the park, and, still sobbing, hastened down to the pond, along the avenues of lindens which her brother had recently planted.
“Yes.... I.... I.... I wished for his death. Yes, I wished it to end quickly!.... I wanted to rest. .... But what will become of me? What peace shall I ever find when he is gone?” muttered the princess, aloud, as she walked through the park with swift steps and beat her breast, which was heaving with convulsive sobs.

After having made the round of the park, which brought her back to the house again, she saw Mlle. Bourienne—who had remained at Bogucharovo, and had refused to go away—coming toward her, in company with a man whom she did not recognize. This was the district-predvodityel, who had come in person to impress upon the princess the imperative need of their immediate departure.

The Princess Mariya heard what he said, but his words had no meaning for her; she conducted him into the house, asked him to remain to breakfast, and sat down with him. Then, excusing herself, she went to the old prince’s door. The doctor, with a frightened face, came to her, and said she could not go in. “Go away, princess; go away, go away!”

The princess went into the park again, and down the slope to the pond, and threw herself on the turf, where no one could see her. She knew not how long she remained there. Women’s steps running along the avenue roused her from her reverie. She got up and saw her maid Dunyasha, who was evidently in search of her, suddenly stop with a terrified face at sight of her mistress.

“Please, princess.... the prince....” stammered Dunyasha, in a broken voice.

“Instantly, I am coming, I am coming,” cried the princess, not giving Dunyasha time to finish telling what she had to say, and ran to the house, trying not to look at the maid.

“Princess, God’s will is done; you must be prepared for the worst,” said the predvodityel, who met her at the doorway.

“Leave me! It is false!” she cried angrily.

The doctor tried to hold her back. She pushed him away, and ran into the room. "Why do these people look so frightened? Why do they try to keep me away? I do not need them. What are they doing here?"

She opened the door, and the bright sunlight in the room which a short time ago had been kept so dark filled her with terror. The old nyanya and other women were busy in the room. They all moved away from the bed, and made room for her to approach. He still lay on the same bed; but the stern aspect of his face, calm in death, rooted the Princess Mariya to the threshold.

"No! he is not dead! It cannot be!" said the Princess Mariya to herself; she went to him, and, overcoming the horror which seized her, she pressed her lips to his cheek. But instantly she recoiled from the bed. Suddenly all the affection for him which she had just felt so powerfully, vanished, and instead came a feeling of horror for what was before her.

-"No! he is no more! He is gone! And in his place here, where he was, is this strange and unfriendly thing; this frightful, blood-curdling, repulsive mystery!"

And, covering her face with her hands, the Princess Mariya fell into the arms of the doctor, who sustained her.

Under the superintendence of Tikhon and the doctor, the women laved that which had been the prince; they tied a handkerchief around his head, so that his jaw might not stiffen with the mouth open, and they bound together his legs with another handkerchief. Then they dressed him in his uniform, with his orders, and laid out his little weazened body on a table. God knows under whose direction and at what time all this was accomplished, but everything seemed to be done of itself.

By night the candles were burning around the coffin, the pall was laid over it; juniper was strewn on the floor; a printed prayer was placed under the wrinkled head of the dead, and in the room sat the diachok reading the psalter.

Just as horses shy and crowd together and neigh at the sight of a dead horse, so in the drawing-room, around the coffin of the dead prince, gathered a throng of strangers and the members of the household,—the pre-dvodityel, and the starosta, and peasant women,—and all, with staring eyes and panic-stricken, crossed themselves and bowed low, and kissed the aged prince's cold, stiff hand.

CHAPTER IX

Until Prince Andrei went to reside at Bogucharovo, the place had always been an "absentee" estate, and the peasantry bore an entirely different character from those of Luisiya Gorui. They differed in speech and in dress and in customs. They called themselves "children of the steppe." The old prince praised them for their endurance in work when they came over to Luisiya Gorui to help get in the crops or dig ponds and ditches; but he did not like them, because of their boorishness.

Their manners had not been softened since Prince Andrer's last residence there, in spite of his dispensaries and schools, and the lightening of the obrok or quit-rent; on the contrary, those traits of character which the old prince called boorishness seemed to have been intensified. Strange, obscure rumors were always finding credence among them; at one time they got the notion that they were all to be enrolled as Cossacks; another time, it was a new religion which they were to be forced to accept; then, again, there was talk about certain imperial dispensations; then, at the time they took the oath of allegiance to Paul Petrovitch, in 1797, they got the notion that their freedom had been granted them, but that their masters had deprived them of it; and, again, it was the return of Peter Feodorovitch to the throne, who would be Tsar in seven years, and give them absolute freedom, so that everything would be simple and easy, and they would have no laws at all.

The rumors of the war and of Napoleon and his invasion were connected in their minds with obscure notions of Antichrist, the end of the world, and perfect freedom.

1 Peter III.

In the vicinity of Bogucharovo were a number of large villages, belonging to the crown or to non-resident proprietors. It was very rarely that these proprietors came to reside on their estates; there were also very few domestic serfs, or peasants, who knew how to read and write; and the lives of the peasantry of this region were more noticeably and powerfully affected than elsewhere by those mysterious currents characteristic of the common people in Russia, the significance and causes of which are so inexplicable to contemporaries.

A phenomenon which illustrates this had taken place a score of years before, when an exodus of the peasantry was made toward certain "hot rivers." Hundreds of peasants, including some from Bogucharovo, suddenly sold their cattle and set off with their families "somewhere" toward the southeast. Just as birds fly "somewhere" across the sea, so these men, with their wives and children, made every endeavor to reach that unknown Southeast, where none of them had ever been before. They marched in caravans; here and there one bought his freedom; others ran away, and set forth in wagons or on foot for the "hot rivers"! Many were caught and punished; many were sent to Siberia; many perished of cold and starvation on the road; many returned of their own accord; and, at last, this migration died out of itself, just as it had begun—without any visible reason. But these underground currents ceased not to flow among this people, and they were gathering impetus for some new outbreak, likely to prove just as perplexing, as unexpected, and, at the same time, as simple, natural, and violent.

At the present time, in 1812, any man whose life brought him in contact with the people might have observed that these hidden currents were working with extraordinary energy, and were all ready for an eruption.

Alpatuitch, who had arrived at Bogucharovo some little time before the old prince's decease, had observed that there was considerable excitement among the peasantry; while in the region of Luisiya Gorui — only sixteen versts distant — all the peasants had deserted their homes, leaving their villages to be marauded by the Cossacks; here, on the contrary, in the "Steppe" belt, in the region of Bogucharovo, the peasantry, so the report ran, had dealings with the French, were in receipt of certain papers which were circulating among them, and had no thought of leaving their homes.

He knew, through certain of the household serfs who were faithful to him, that a muzhik named Karp, who had great influence over the mir, or peasant commune, had lately returned from driving a crown wagon-train, and was spreading the report that the Cossacks were ravaging the villages which had been deserted by their inhabitants, while the French were not touching them.

He was informed on good authority that another muzhik, the evening before, had brought from the village of Visloukhovo, where the French were, a proclamation from a French general, representing to the inhabitants that no harm would be done to them, and that cash should be paid for whatever was taken, provided they remained in their homes. As proof positive of this, the muzhik brought with him from Visloukhovo a hundred rubles in assignats — he did not know that they were counterfeit — which had been paid to him for his hay.

Finally, and more important than all, Alpatuitch found that on that very day when he had commanded the starosta to procure wagons for the conveyance of the princess's effects from Bogucharovo, the peasants had held a morning meeting in the village, at which it had been voted that they should not stir from the place, but wait. And meantime there was no time to lose.

The predvodityel, on the very day on which the prince had died, — the twenty-seventh, — had come to urge the princess to depart without further delay, as the risk was growing constantly more imminent. He had declared that after the twenty-eighth he would not be responsible for the consequences. That same evening, after the prince's demise, he had gone away, promising to be present at the funeral on the next day. But on the next day it was impossible for him to be present, since news had been brought to him of an unexpected approach of the French, and he had barely time to remove his own family and valuables from his estate.

For thirty years, Dron, whom the old prince always called by the affectionate diminutive, Dronushka, had exercised the functions of starosta, or bailiff, at Bogucharovo.

Dron was one of those muzhiks—powerful, physically and morally—who, as soon as they come to years of discretion, grow a beard, and live on without change till they are sixty or seventy years old, without a gray hair or the loss of a tooth, just as erect and powerful at sixty as they were at thirty.

Dron, shortly after his returning from his expedition to the "hot rivers," in which he had taken part, had been made starosta-burmistr; or bailiff headman, of the village of Bogucharovo; and, since that time, he had performed without reproach all the functions of that office. The muzhiks feared him more than they feared their barin. His masters—both the old prince and the young prince—respected him, and, in jest, called him "minister." During all the time of his service, Dron had never once been drunk or sick. Never, even after sleepless nights or after the most exhausting labors, was he known to show the slightest slothfulness, and, though he did not know his letters, he never made the slightest mistakes in his money accounts, or as to the number of poods of flour which he carried in monstrous loads and sold, or as to the amount of a single rick of corn harvested in the fields of Bogucharovo.

Alpatuitch, on his arrival from the devastated Luisiya Gorui, summoned this Dron on the very day of the funeral, and ordered him to have ready a dozen horses for the princess's conveyance, and eighteen teams for the luggage which she was to take with her from Bogucharovo. Although the peasantry paid an vbrok, or quit-rent, Alpatuitch never dreamed that there would be any difficulty in having this order carried out, since the villages contained two hundred and thirty taxable households, and the muzhiks were well-to-do.

But the starosta, Dron, on receiving this order, dropped his eyes and made no answer. Alpatuitch named certain peasants whom he knew, and ordered him to make the requisitions on them.

Dron replied that these men's horses were off on carrier duty. Alpatuitch named still other muzhiks. And these men, also, according to Dron, had no horses: some were off with the government trains; others were out of condition; still others had lost theirs through lack of forage. According to Dron's report, it was impossible to secure horses for the carriages, to say nothing of those for the baggage wagons.

Alpatuitch looked sharply at the starosta and scowled. In the same way as Dron was a model of what a peasant starosta should be, in the same way Alpatuitch had not managed the prince's estates for nothing all those twenty years, and he also was a model overseer. He was in the highest degree qualified to understand, as by a sort of scent, the wants and instincts of the people with whom he had to do, and this made him a surpassingly excellent overseer.

He knew by a single glance at Dron, that Dron's answers were not the expression of Dron's individual opinions, but merely the expression of the general disposition of the Bogucharovo commune, in which the starosta was evidently involved. But, at the same time, he knew that Dron, who had grown rich and was hated by the commune, must necessarily waver between the two camps, the peasants' and the master's. This wavering he could detect in his eyes, and, therefore, Alpatuitch, with a frown, drew near to Dron.

"Listen, you, Dronushka!" said he. "You need not tell me idle tales. His illustriousness Prince Andrei Nikolaitch himself gave me orders that all the peasantry should leave, and not remain behind with the enemy; and those are the Tsar's orders also. So any one who stays is a traitor to the Tsar. Do you hear?"
“I hear,” replied Dron, not raising his eyes. Alpatuitch was not satisfied with this answer.

“Ah, Dron! ill will come of it!” exclaimed Alpatuitch, shaking his head.

“You have the power,” returned Dron, mournfully.

“Ah, Dron! give it up!” exclaimed Alpatuitch, taking his hand out from the breast of his coat, and with a solemn gesture pointing under Dron’s feet. “Not only do I see through and through you, but I can see three arshins under you; everything there is,” said he, looking down at Dron’s feet.

Dron grew confused; he gave Alpatuitch a fleeting look, and then dropped his eyes again.

“Stop all this nonsense, and tell the people to get ready to leave for Moscow, and have the teams ready to-morrow morning for the princess, and mind you don’t attend any more of their meetings! Do you hear?”

Dron suddenly threw himself at his feet.

“Yakof Alpatuitch! discharge me! Take the keys from me! Discharge me, for Christ’s sake!”

“Stop!” said Alpatuitch, sternly. “I can see three arshins deep under you!” he repeated, knowing that his skill in going after bees, his knowledge of the times and seasons for sowing, and the fact that for a score of years he had succeeded in satisfying the old prince had long ago given him the reputation of being a koldun, or wizard, and that to kolduns was attributed the power of seeing three arshins under a man.

Dron got to his feet, and tried to say something, but Alpatuitch interrupted him.

“Come now! What is your idea in all this? Ha? What are you dreaming of? Ha?”

“What shall I do with the people?” asked Dron. “They are all stirred up! And, besides, I have told them....”

“Told them?” repeated Alpatuitch. “Are they drunk?” he demanded laconically.

“All stirred up, Yakof Alpatuitch! They have just brought another cask!”

“Now, then, listen! I will go to the ispravnik, and you hasten back to the people, and bid them quit all this sort of thing, and get ready the teams."

"I obey," replied Dron.

Yakof Alpatuitch insisted on nothing more. He had been in control of the people too long not to know that the principal way of bringing the people to subordination was not to show the slightest doubt that they would become subordinate. Having wrung from Dron the submissive "Slushayu-s—I obey," Yakhof Alpatuitch contented himself with that, although he not merely suspected, but was even certain in his own mind, that, without the assistance of a squad of militia, nothing would be done.

And, in point of fact, there were no teams forthcoming, as he supposed. Another meeting of the peasantry was held at the village tavern; and this meeting voted to drive the horses out into the woods and not to furnish the teams. Saying nothing of all this to the princess, Alpatuitch gave orders to have the carts that had brought his own effects from Luisiya Gorui unloaded, and to have his horses put to the Princess Mariya's carriage; and he himself went to consult with the authorities.

CHAPTER X

The Princess Mariya, after her father's funeral, shut herself up in her room, and admitted no one. Her maid came to the door to say that Alpatuitch was there to learn her wishes in regard to the departure. (This was before his interview with Dron.) The princess sat up on the divan where she had been lying, and spoke through the closed door, declaring that she would never go away anywhere, and asked her to leave her in peace. All the windows of the room which the Princess Mariya occupied faced the south. She lay on the divan with her face turned toward the wall, and picking with her fingers at the buttons on the leathern cushion, which was the only thing that she could see, while her vague thoughts were concentrated on one thing: she was thinking about the unavoidableness of death and of her own moral baseness, which she had never before realized and which came to light during her father's illness. She wanted, but she dared not, to pray; she dared not, in that state of mind in which she found herself, to turn to God in prayer. Long she lay in that position.

The sun had gone round to the other side of the house, and its slanting afternoon beams fell through the opened windows and lighted up the room and the part of the morocco cushion at which she was looking. The train of somber thoughts suddenly ceased. She instinctively sat up, smoothed her hair, got to her feet, and went to the window, where, without thinking, she breathed in the coolness of the bright but windy afternoon.

"Yes, now you can enjoy your fill of the evening! He is gone, and no one is here to interfere with you," said she to herself, and, dropping into a chair, leaned her head on the window-seat.

Some one, in a soft, affectionate voice, called her name from the park side of the window, and kissed her on the head. She looked up.

It was Mlle. Bourienne, in a black dress trimmed with white. She had softly approached the Princess Mariya, kissed her with a sigh, and immediately burst into tears. The princess looked at her. All her previous collisions with her, her jealousy of her, came back to her remembrance; she also remembered how he of late had changed toward Mlle. Bourienne, could not even bear to see her, and consequently how unjust had been the reproaches which the Princess Mariya had in her heart made against her.

"Yes, and can I, I who have wished for his death, can I judge any one else?" she asked herself.

The Princess Mariya had a keen sense of Mlle. Bourienne's trying situation, held by her at a distance as she had recently been, and yet at the same time dependent on her, and dwelling under a stranger's roof. And she began to feel a pity for her. She looked at her with a sweet, questioning look, and stretched out her hand. Mlle. Bourienne immediately had a fresh paroxysm of tears, began to kiss the princess's hand, and to speak of the affliction that had come upon her, and claimed to be a sympathizer in that affliction. She declared that her only consolation in this sorrow was that the princess allowed her to share it with her. She said that all their previous misunderstandings ought to be forgotten in presence of this terrible loss, that she felt that her conscience was clear before all men, and that he from above would bear witness to her love and gratitude.

The princess listened to her without comprehending what she was saying, but she looked at her from time to time, and heard the sounds of her voice.

"Your position is doubly terrible, dear princess," said Mlle. Bourienne, after a short silence. "I understand how it is that you could not have thought.... that you cannot think about yourself; but, from the love which I bear you, I am compelled to do so for you.... Has Alpatuitch been to see you? Has he said anything to you about going away?" she asked.

The Princess Mariya made no reply. She could not realize who was going away or where they were going.

"How could they undertake anything just now? Why think of anything? What difference does it make?"

She made no answer.

"Do you know, chère Marie," asked Mlle. Bourienne, "do you know that we are in peril, that we are surrounded by the French? It is dangerous to go now. If we were to start, we should almost certainly be taken prisoner, and God knows...."

The Princess Mariya looked at her friend without comprehending what she was saying.

"Akh! if you could only know how little, how little I care now," said she. "Of course, I should never wish such a thing as to go away and leave him.... Alpatuitch said something to me about going away.... Talk it over with him; I cannot and I will not hear...."
"I have spoken with him. He hopes that we shall be able to get away to-morrow; but it is my opinion that we had better remain here now," said Mlle. Bourienne. "Because—you must agree with me, chère Marie—to fall into the hands of the soldiers or insurgent peasants would be horrible."

Mlle. Bourienne drew forth from her reticule a proclamation—printed on paper different from that used generally in Russia—from the French general Rameau, in which the inhabitants were advised not to abandon their homes, since full protection would be vouchsafed them by the French authorities; this she handed to the princess.

"I think it would be better to apply to this general," said Mlle. Bourienne. "And I am convinced that we should be treated with due consideration."

The Princess Mariya read the paper, and her face contracted with a sort of tearless sob.

"From whom did you get this?" she demanded.

"They probably knew that I am French from my name," said Mlle. Bourienne, with a blush.

The princess, with the paper in her hand, got up from the window, and with a pale face left the room, and went into Prince Andrei's cabinet, which adjointed.

"Dunyasha, summon Alpatuitch, Dronushka, any one," exclaimed the Princess Mariya; "and tell Amalie Karlovna not to come near me," she added, hearing Mlle. Bourienne's voice. "Go quick! quick!" exclaimed the Princess Mariya, panic-stricken at the thought that she might be left in the power of the French.

"What if Prince Andrei knew that she were under the protection of the French! That she, the daughter of Prince Nikolai Andreyitch Bolkonsky, had asked General Rameau to grant her his protection, and put herself under obligations for benefits received from him!"

The mere suggestion of such a thing filled her with horror, made her shudder, turn red, and feel still more violently than ever before those impulses of anger and outraged pride.
She now vividly realized all the difficulties, and, above all, the humiliations of her position.

"They — the French — will take possession of this house; M. le général Rameau will make use of Prince Andrei's cabinet; for their amusement they will ransack and read his letters and papers. Mademoiselle Bourienne lui fera les honneurs de Bogucharovoy! They will out of special favor grant me a sleeping-room; the soldiers will tear open my father's newly made grave in order to rob him of his crosses and stars; they will boast before me of their victories over the Russians, they will pretend to sympathize in my grief," thought the Princess Mariya, not in her own thoughts, but feeling herself compelled to think as her father and brother would have thought.

For her personally it was a matter of utter indifference where she stayed or what happened to her; but at the same time she felt that she was the representative of her late father and of Prince Andrei. She could not help thinking these thoughts and feeling these feelings. Whatever they would have said, whatever they would have done, now this she felt that it was indispensable for her to do. She went into Prince Andrei's cabinet, and, in her endeavors to follow out what would be his ideas, she reviewed her position.

The demands of life, which she had felt had been annihilated at the moment of her father's death, suddenly, with new, never-before-experienced violence, rushed up before her, and took possession of her.

Flushed with excitement, she walked up and down the room, summoning first Alpatuitch, then Mikhaïl Ivanovitch, then Tikhon, then Dron. Dunyasha, the old nurse, and all the maids were equally unable to say how far Mlle. Bourienne was correct in what she had declared. Alpatuitch was not at home; he had gone to consult with the authorities. Mikhaïl Ivanovitch, the architect, on being summoned, came into the Princess Mariya's presence with sleepy eyes, and could tell her nothing. He replied to her questions with precisely the same non-committal smile with which for fifteen years he had been in the habit of dealing with the old prince, and she could get nothing definite from his replies.

Then the old valet Tikhon was called, and, with a downcast and impassive face, bearing all the symptoms of incurable woe, he replied to all her questions with his "Slushayu-s—I obey," and could scarcely refrain from sobbing as he looked at her.

At last the starosta Dron came into the room, and, making her a low obeisance, stood respectfully at the threshold.

The Princess Mariya glided through the room and paused in front of him.

"Dronushka!" said she, seeing in him an undoubted friend, the same Dronushka who had always brought home pieces of gingerbread with him from his trips to the yarmarka, or annual bazaar, at Viazma, and presented to her with a smile. — "Dronushka! now, since our sad loss...."

She began and then paused, unable to proceed.

"All our goings are under God," said he, with a sigh. Neither spoke.

"Dronushka! Alpatuitch has gone; I have no one to turn to; is it true, what I am told, that we cannot get away?"

"Not get away? Certainly you can get away, princess," said Dron.

"They tell me there is danger from the enemy. My friend,¹ I am helpless, I don't understand anything about it, I am entirely alone. I decidedly wish to start to-night or to-morrow morning early."

Dron stood silent. He looked from under his brows at the princess.

"No horses," said he at last, "and I have told Yakof Alpatuitch so."

"How is that?" asked the princess.

"It is God's punishment," said Dron; "what horses we had have been taken by the troops, and the rest have perished. That's the way it is this year. 'T would n't so much matter about feeding the horses, if we ourselves were n't perishing of starvation. Often for three days at a time we go without a bite. We have nothing at all; we are utterly ruined.”

¹ Galubchik.

The Princess Mariya listened attentively to what he said.

"The peasantry are ruined? You say they have no corn?" she asked.

"They are perishing of famine," said Dron. "And as for teams...."

"But why have n't you told me of this before, Dronushka? Can't they be helped? I will do all in my power...."

It was strange for the Princess Mariya to think that now, at this moment when her heart was filled with such sorrow, there could be poor men and rich, and that the rich did not help the poor. She had a general notion that, when the masters had a reserve of corn, it was distributed among the serfs. She knew also that neither her father nor her brother would refuse to help the peasantry in case of need; all that she feared was that she might make some blunder in speaking about this distribution of corn which she was anxious to make. She was glad of some pretext for active work, something that would allow her without pangs of conscience to forget her own sorrow. She proceeded to question Dronushka in regard to the necessities of the muzhiks and the store of reserve corn belonging to the estate at Bogucharovo.

"We have corn belonging to the estate, have we not, brother?" she demanded.

"The master's corn is untouched," said Dron, with pride. "Our prince had not ordered it to be sold."

"Give that to the peasantry; give them all they need. I grant it in my brother's name," said the Princess Mariya.

Dron made no reply, and drew a long sigh.

"You give them this corn, if there is enough for them. Give it all to them. I order it in my brother's name, and tell them: 'What is ours is always theirs. We shall not grudge it for them.' Tell them so."
Dron looked steadily at the princess while she was saying this.

“Discharge me, matushka, for God’s sake; order the keys to be taken from me,” said he. “I have been in service for twenty-three years! I have never done anything dishonest; discharge me, for God’s sake!”

The Princess Mariya could not understand what he wanted of her, or why he wished to be relieved of his office. She replied that she had never conceived a doubt of his devotion, and that she was always ready to do anything for him or for any of the muzhiks.

CHAPTER XI

An hour later Dunyasha came to the princess with the news that Dron was there, and that all the muzhiks had collected in accordance with the princess’s orders at the granary, and wished to have speech with their mistress.

“But I never called them,” said the Princess Mariya; “I merely told Dronushka to give them corn.”

“Then, for God’s sake, princess-matushka, order them to disperse and don’t go to them. They are deceiving you,” exclaimed Dunyasha. “But Yakof Alpatuitch will soon be back, and then we will go.... and don’t you allow....”

“How are they deceiving me?” asked the princess in amazement.

“But I am certain of it! Only heed my words, for God’s sake. Just ask nurse here. They declare they will not go away at your orders.”

“You have got it entirely wrong. .... Besides, I have never ordered them to go away,” said the Princess Mariya. “Fetch Dronushka.”....

Dron came in and confirmed what Dunyasha said: the muzhiks had assembled at the princess’s orders.

“But I never summoned them,” said the princess. “You did not give my message correctly. I only told you to give them corn.”
Dron made no reply, but sighed.

"If you order it they will disperse," said he.

"No, no, I will go to them," said the princess.

In spite of the persuasion of Dunyasha and the old nurse, the Princess Mariya went down the steps. Dronushka, Dunyasha, the old nurse, and Mikhaïl Ivanuitch followed her.

"They apparently think that I give them the corn so that they should stay at home, while I myself am going away, abandoning them to the mercy of the French," thought the Princess Mariya. "But I will promise them rations and quarters at our pod-Moskovnaya; I am sure André would do even more in my place," she said to herself as she went toward the throng that had gathered in the twilight on the green near the granary.

The throng showed some signs of confusion, and moved and swayed a little, and hats were quickly removed as she approached. The Princess Mariya, with downcast eyes, and getting her feet entangled in her dress, went toward them. So many different eyes from faces young and old were fixed on her, and so many different people were collected, that the princess did not distinguish any particular person; and, as she felt the necessity of addressing them all at once, she did not know how to set about it. But once more the consciousness that she was the representative of her father and brother gave her courage, and she boldly began to speak.

"I am very glad that you came," she began, not raising her eyes, and conscious of her heart beating fast and strong. "Dronushka told me that you were ruined by the war. That is our common misfortune, and I shall spare no endeavor to help you. I myself am going away because it is dangerous here.... and the enemy are near.... because.... I will give you everything, friends, and I beg of you to take all, all our corn, so that you may not suffer from want. And if you have been told that I distribute the corn among you so as to keep you here, that is a falsehood. On the contrary, I beg of you to go with all your possessions to our pod-Moskovnaya, and I will engage and promise that you shall not suffer. You shall be given homes and provisions."

The princess paused. In the throng sighs were heard, and that was all.

"I do not give this of myself," continued the princess; "but I do it in the name of my late father, who was a good barin to you, and in behalf of my brother and his son."

She again paused. No one broke in on her silence. "Our misfortune is universal, and we will share everything together. All that is mine is yours," said she, gazing at the faces ranged in front of her.

All eyes were fixed on her with one expression, the significance of which she could not interpret. Whether it were curiosity, devotion, gratitude, or fear, or distrust, that expression, whatever it was, was the same in all.

"Very grateful for your kindness, but we don't want to take the master's corn," said a voice in the rear of the throng.

"Yes, but why not?" asked the princess.

No one replied, and the Princess Mariya, glancing around the throng, observed that now all eyes which met hers immediately turned away.

"Why are you unwilling?" she asked again.

No one replied.

The Princess Mariya felt awkward at this silence. She tried to catch some one's eye.

"Why don't you speak?" demanded the princess, addressing an aged man, who, leaning on his cane, was standing in front of her. "Tell me if you think that anything else is needed. I will do everything for you," said she, as she caught his eye. But he, as if annoyed by this, hung his head and muttered: —

"Why should we? We don't want your corn."

"What! us abandon everything? We don't agree to it."...."We don't agree to it."...."Not with our consent."...."We are sorry, but it shan't be done with our consent."...."Go off by yourself alone!" rang out from the mob on different sides.

And again all the faces of the throng had one and the same expression; but this time it was assuredly not curiosity or gratitude, but one of angry, obstinate resolution.

"Oh, but you have not understood me," exclaimed the Princess Mariya, with a melancholy smile. "Why are you unwilling to go? I promise to give you new homes and feed you. But if you stay here the enemy will ruin you."

But her voice was drowned by the voices of the mob.

"Not with our consent. Let him destroy us. We won't touch your corn. Not with our consent."

The Princess Mariya tried again to catch the eyes of some other person in the crowd; but not one was directed toward her; their eyes evidently avoided her. She felt strange, and ill at ease.

"There now! she's a shrewd one. Follow her to prison. They want to get our houses, and make serfs of us again—the idea! We won't touch your corn," rang the various voices.

The Princess Mariya, hanging her head, left the crowd, and went back to the house. Reiterating her orders to Dron to have the horses ready against their departure the next day, she went to her room and remained alone with her thoughts.

CHAPTER XII

The Princess Mariya sat long that night beside her open window in her room, listening to the hubbub of voices which came up to her from the peasant village; and yet she was not thinking of them. She felt that the more she thought about them, the less she should understand them. Her mind was concentrated on one thing: her affliction, which now, after the interruption caused by her labors in connection with the present situation, seemed already far in the past. She could now think calmly, could weep, and could pray.

With the sunset the breeze had died down. The night was calm and cool. By twelve o'clock the voices began to grow still; a cock crowed; the full moon began to rise up from behind the lindens; a cool, white dew-mist arose, and peace reigned over the village and over the house.

One after the other passed before her mind the pictures of the recent past: the illness and the last moments of her father. And, with a melancholy joy, she now dwelt on these pictures, repelling with horror only one: the vision of his death, a thing which she felt wholly unable to contemplate, even in imagination, at that calm, mysterious hour of night. And these pictures came before her with such vividness, and with such fullness of detail, that they seemed to her now like the reality, and then, again, like something past, or, again, like something that was to come.

Now she vividly recalled the moment when he received the stroke, and was borne in the arms of his men into the house at Luisiya Gorui, muttering unintelligible words with his disobedient tongue, knitting his grizzled brows, and looking anxiously and timidly at her.

"Even then, he wanted to tell me what he said on the very day of his death," she said to herself. "What he said to me then was all the time in his mind."

And then she imagined, with all its details, that night at Luisiya Gorui, on the evening before he received the stroke, when, with a presentiment of evil, she remained with him against his will. She could not sleep, and she went down late at night on her tiptoes, and, going to the door of the greenhouse, where her father had tried to sleep that night, had listened to him. He was talking to Tikhon in a peevish, weary voice. He was telling him something about the Crimea, about the genial nights, about the empress. He was evidently in a talkative mood.

"And why did he not call me? Why did he not allow me then to take Tikhon's place?"

She asked herself that question then, and again she asked it now.

"He was never one to confide in any one what he kept locked up in the chambers of his heart. And now never again for him and for me will return that moment when he might say all he wished to say, and then I, and not Tikhon, might have listened and understood him. Why did I not go in where he was?" wondered the Princess Mariya. "Maybe even then he would have told me what he said on the day of his death. While he was talking with Tikhon he twice asked about me. He wished to see me, and there I was standing at the door. He found it tiresome and stupid to talk with Tikhon, for he could not understand him. I remember how he spoke with him about Liza, as if she were still alive, — he had forgotten that she was dead, — and Tikhon reminded him that she had passed away, and he cried, 'Durak — idiot!' It was hard for him. As I stood outside I heard him groan, and lie down on the bed and cry aloud, 'My God!' Why didn't I go in then and there? What would he have done to me? What trouble might I not have made? Perhaps even then he would have been comforted; perhaps he would have called me—what he did." And the Princess repeated aloud the caressing word which he had spoken to her on the day of his death: "Dushenka," — Dear heart, — "Du-shen-ka," repeated the princess, and she burst into tears which lightened the sorrow of her soul.

Now she saw his face plainly before her: and not that face which she had known ever since her earliest remembrance, and which she had always seen afar off, as it were, but that weak, submissive face which she, for the first time in her memory, as she bent down close to it to catch the last words that fell from his mouth, saw near at hand with all its wrinkles and details. "Dushenka!" she repeated.

"What thoughts were in his mind when he said that word? What is he thinking now?"

That question suddenly occurred to her, and for answer to it she seemed to see him before her with that same expression of face which he had worn in his coffin with the white handkerchief binding up his face. And that horror which had seized her then, when she had touched him, and then felt so assured that this thing not only was not he, but something mysterious and repulsive, came over her again. She tried to think of something else, she tried to pray, and she could do neither. With wide, staring eyes she gazed at the moonlight and at the shadows, every instant expecting to see his dead face, and she felt that the silence that hung over the house and in the house was turning her to stone.

"Dunyasha!" she whispered. "Dunyasha!" she cried, in a wild voice; and, tearing herself away from the silence, she ran into the domestics' room, meeting the old nurse and the women, who came to meet her at her cry.

CHAPTER XIII

On the twenty-ninth of August Rostof and Ilyin, accompanied only by Lavrushka, just back from his brief captivity, and an orderly sergeant of hussars, set forth from their bivouac at Yankovo, fifteen versts from Bogucharovo, to make trial of a new horse which Ilyin had recently purchased, and to find whether there was any fodder in the villages round about.

Bogucharovo, during the last three days, had been midway between two hostile armies, so that it was just as likely to be occupied by the Russian rear-guard as by the French vanguard; and consequently Rostof, like the thoughtful squadron commander that he was, conceived the notion of taking possession of the provisions at Bogucharovo in anticipation of the French.

Rostof and Ilyin were in the most jovial mood. On the way to Bogucharovo, to the princely estate and farm where they hoped to find a great throng of domestics and pretty young girls, they now questioned Lavrushka about Napoleon, and made merry over his tale, and then they ran races to test Ilyin's horse.

Rostof had not the slightest notion that this village where he was bound was the estate of that very same Bolkonsky who had been betrothed to his sister.
He and Ilyin made a final spurt in trial of their horses down the slope in front of Bogucharovo, and Rostof, outriding Ilyin, was the first to enter the street of the village.

"You got in first!" cried Ilyin, growing red in the face.

"Yes, always ahead, not only on the level, but here also," replied Rostof, smoothing the flank of his foam-flecked Donets.

"And I on my Franzuska, your illustriousness," exclaimed Lavrushka, coming up behind them on his cart-jade, which he called "Franzuska," or "Frenchy," in honor of his adventure. "I'd ha' come in first only I didn't want to mortify you."

They rode at a footpace up to the granary, near which a great crowd of muzhiks were gathered.

Some of them took off their caps; some, not taking off their caps, gazed at the newcomers. Two old lean muzhiks, with wrinkled faces and thin beards, came out from the public-house, reeling, and touting some incoherent snatch of a song; and approached the officers.

"Say, my hearties," sang out Rostof, with a laugh, "have you any hay?"

"Like as two peas," exclaimed Ilyin.

"We're jo-ol-ly g-oo-d f-fel-el-lo-ows," sang one of the men, with a grin of happiness.

A muzhik came out of the throng and approached Rostof.

"Which side are you from?" he asked.

"The French," replied Rostof, jokingly, with a smile "And that's Napoleon himself," he added, pointing to Lavrushka.

"Of course, you're Russians, ain't you?" asked the muzhik.

"Is there a large party of you?" asked another, a little man, who also joined them.

"Ever so many," replied Rostof. "And what brings you all together here?" he added. "A holiday festival?"

"The elders have collected for communal business," replied the muzhik who first came out.
At this time two women and a man in a white hat made their appearance on the road from the mansion, coming toward the officers. "The one in pink is mine! Don't dare cheat me of her!" exclaimed Ilyin, catching sight of Dunyasha, coming resolutely toward him.

"She shall be yours," replied Lavrushka, with a wink.

"What do you want, my beauty?" asked Ilyin, with a smile.

"The princess has sent to ask what is your regiment and your name."

"I am Count Rostof, squadron commander, and I am your humble servant."

"De-e-ev-lish jol-ol-ly g-ga-gals," sang one of the drunken muzhiks, with a jovial grin, and giving Ilyin a meaning look, as he stood talking with the maid. Dunyasha was followed by Alpatuiitch, who, at some distance, took off his hat in Rostof's presence.

"I make bold to trouble your nobility," said he, politely, but manifesting a certain scorn of the officer's youthful appearance, and placing his hand in the breast of his coat. "My mistress, the daughter of General... the late Prince Nikolai Andreyevitch Bolkonsky, who died on the twenty-seventh instant, finds herself in difficulty on account of the insubordination and boorishness of these individuals here" — he pointed to the muzhiks. "And she begs you to confer with her — if it would not be asking too much," said Alpatuiitch, with a timid smile, — "if you would come a few steps farther.... and besides it is not so pleasant in presence of...."

He indicated the two drunken muzhiks, who were circling round them and in their rear like gadflies round a horse.

"Hey! Alpatuiitch — Hey! Yakof Alpatuiitch".... "Ser'ous shing! 'Scuse us! Ser'ous shing!".... "'Scuse us, for Christ's sake! Hey!" said the muzhiks, leering at him. Rostof looked at the drunken muzhiks, and smiled.

"Or perhaps this amuses your illustriousness?" suggested Alpatuiitch, with a sedate look, and indicating the old men with his other hand—the one not in the breast of his coat.

"No, there's no amusement in that," said Rostof, and started off. "What is the trouble?" he asked.

"I make bold to explain to your illustriousness that these coarse peasants here are not willing that their mistress should leave her estate, and they threaten to take her horses out; and though everything has been packed up since morning, her illustriousness can't get away."

"Incredible!" cried Rostof.

"I have the honor of reporting to you the essential truth," maintained Alpatuitch.

Rostof dismounted, and, throwing the reins to his orderly, went with Alpatuitch to the house, questioning him on the state of affairs. In point of fact, the offer of corn which the princess had made to the muzhiks the evening before, her explanations to Dron and to the meeting, had made affairs so much worse that Dron had definitely laid down his keys, and taken sides with the peasantry, and had refused to obey Alpatuitch's summons; and that morning, when the princess had ordered to have the horses put in so as to take her departure, the muzhiks had gone in a regular mob to the granary, and sent a messenger declaring that they would not allow the princess to leave the village, that orders had come not to leave and they should unharness the horses. Alpatuitch had gone to them, and reasoned with them, but they had replied—Karp being their spokesman for the most part—Dron did not show himself at all—that it was impossible to let the princess take her departure, that there was a law against it; "only let her stay at home, and they would serve her as they always had done, and obey her in everything."

At the moment that Rostof and Ilyin had come spur- ring up the avenue, the Princess Mariya, in spite of the dissuasion of Alpatuitch, the old nurse, and her women, had given orders to have the horses put in, and had made up her mind to start; but when the coachmen saw the cavalrymen galloping up, they took them for the French, and ran away; and wailing and lamentations of women were heard in the house.

“Batyushka!” "Blessed father!” "God has sent you,” were the words of welcome that met him, as Rostof passed through the anteroom.

The Princess Mariya, entirely bewildered and weak with fright, was sitting in the drawing-room when Rostof was brought in to her. She had no idea who he was and why he was there and what was going to become of her. When she saw his Russian face, and recognized by his manner and the first words he spoke that he was a man of her own walk in life, she looked at him with her deep, radiant eyes, and began to speak in broken tones, her voice trembling with emotion.

Rostof immediately found something very romantic in this adventure. "An unprotected maiden, overwhelmed with grief, left alone to the mercy of rough, insurgent muzhiks! And what a strange fate has brought me here!” thought Rostof, as he listened to her and looked at her. “And what sweetness and gratitude in her features and her words!” he said to himself, as he listened to her faltering tale.

When she related all that had taken place on the day after her father's obsequies, her voice trembled. She turned aside, and then, as if she were afraid Rostof would take her words to be an excuse for rousing his pity, she glanced at him with a timidly questioning look.

The tears stood in Rostof's eyes. The Princess Mariya observed it, and she looked gratefully at him with those brilliant eyes of hers, which made one forget the plainness of her face.

"I cannot tell you, princess, how happy I am at the chance that brought me here and puts me in a position to show you how ready I am to serve you," said Rostof, rising. "You can start immediately, and I pledge you my word of honor that no one shall dare to cause you the slightest unpleasantness, if you will only permit me to serve as your escort;” and, making her a courtly bow such as are made to ladies of the imperial blood, he went to the door. By the courtliness of his tone, Rostof seemed to show that, in spite of the fact that he should consider it an honor to be acquainted with her, he would not think of taking advantage of her hour of misfortune to inflict his acquaintance upon her.

The Princess Mariya understood and appreciated this delicacy.

"I am very, very grateful to you," said she, in French. "But I hope that this was merely a misunderstanding, and that no one is to blame for it...." She suddenly broke down. "Forgive me," said she.

Rostof once more made a low bow, and left the room with an angry scowl.

CHAPTER XIV

"Well, now, pretty? ah, brother, my pink one's a beauty, and her name is Dunyasha...."

But as he glanced into Rostof's face Ilyin held his tongue. He saw that his hero and commander had come back in an entirely different frame of mind.

Rostof gave Ilyin a wrathful glance, and, without deigning to give him any answer, he strode swiftly down to the village.

"I will teach them! I will give it to those cutthroats," he muttered to himself.

Alpatuitich, with a sort of swimming gait that was just short of running, found it hard to overtake him.

"What decision have you been pleased to come to?" he asked, at last catching up with him. Rostof halted and, doubling his fists, made a threatening movement toward Alpatuitich suddenly.

"Decision? What decision? You old dotard!" cried he. "What are you staring at? Ha?—The muzhiks are in revolt and you can't bring them to terms? You yourself are a traitor! I know you. I'll take the hide off you, the whole of you." And, as if afraid of wasting the reserve fund of his righteous wrath, he left Alpatuitich and hastened forward.

Alpatuitich, evidently crushing down his sense of injured innocence, hastened after Rostof with that swimming gait of his, and continued to give him his opinions in regard to the matter. He declared that the muzhiks had got themselves into such a state of recalcitrancy, that at the present moment it would be imprudent to contrarize them, unless one had a squad of soldiers, so that it would be better to send after the soldiers first.

"I'll give them a squad of soldiers.... I'll show how to contrarize them," replied Rostof, not knowing what he was saying, and breathing hard from his unreasoning, keen indignation and the necessity which he felt of expressing this indignation. With no definite plan of action he rushed with strong, resolute steps straight at the mob.

And the nearer he approached it, the more firmly convinced grew Alpatuitch that this imprudent action of his might lead to excellent results. The muzhiks in the throng felt the same thing as they saw his swift, unswerving movements and his resolute, scowling face.

After the hussars had entered the village and Rostof had gone to see the princess, a certain perplexity and division of counsels had prevailed among the peasantry. It began to be bruited among them that these visitors were Russians, and some of the muzhiks declared that they would be angry because their young mistress was detained. Dron was of this opinion, but as soon as he had so expressed himself, Karp and the other muzhiks attacked their former starosta.

"How many years have you been getting your belly full of this commune?" cried Karp. "It's all the same to you. You'll dig up your pot of money and be off! What do you care whether they burn up our houses or not?"

"The order was to keep good order: no one to go from their homes and not carry off the value of a speck o' dust — and there she goes with all she's got," cried another.

"'T was your son's turn, but you were too soft on your young noodle," suddenly exclaimed a little old man, pitching into Dron. "But they shaved my Vanka. Eh! we shall die!"

"Certainly we shall die!"

"I'm not quit of the commune yet," said Dron.

"Of course you're not. You've filled your belly!"....

Then two long, lank muzhiks said their say. As soon as Rostof, accompanied by Ilyin, Lavrushka, and Alpatuitch, drew near the mob, Karp, thrusting his fingers in his belt, and slightly smiling, came forward. Dron, on the contrary, got into the rear ranks, and the throng crowded closer together.

"Hey! Which of you is the starosta here?" cried Rostof, coming up to the mob with swift strides.

"The starosta? What do you want of him?" asked Karp.

But before he had a chance to utter another word his cap flew off, and he was sent reeling with a powerful blow.

"Hats off, you traitors!" cried Rostof, in a stentorian voice. "Where is the starosta?" he thundered, in a voice of fury.

"The starosta, he wants the starosta.... Dron Zakaruitch.... you!" was spoken by various officiously submissive voices, and every hat was doffed.

"We should never think of rebelling; we are keeping order," insisted Karp, and several voices in the rear ranks at the same instant suddenly shouted:—

"It was what the council of elders decided; we have to obey."....

"Do you dare answer back?.... Mob!.... cutthroats!.... traitors!" sang out Rostof, beside himself with rage and in an unnatural voice, seizing Karp by the collar. "Bind him! Bind him!" he cried, though there was no one to execute his orders except Lavrushka and Alpatuitch.

Lavrushka, however, sprang forward and seized Karp by the arms from behind.

"Do you wish us to summon ours from below?" he cried.

1 Zabrit lob, "to shave the brow," that is to enlist a soldier, to conscript.
Alpatuitch turned to the muzhiks, calling two by name, to bind Karp’s arms. These muzhiks submissively stepped forth from the throng and began to unfasten their belts.

“Where is the starosta?” cried Rostof.

Dron, pale and scowling, stood forth.

“Are you the starosta? — Bind him, Lavrushka,” cried Rostof, as if it was impossible for this command to meet with resistance. And, in point of fact, two other muzhiks began to bind Dron, who, in order to facilitate the operation, took off his girdle and handed it to them.

“And see here .... do you all obey me!” — Rostof had turned to the muzhiks. — “Disperse to your homes instantly, and don’t let me hear a word from one of you!”

“Come, now! we’ve done no harm!” .... “We’ve only been acting silly.” .... “Made fools of ourselves, that’s all.” .... “I said there was n’t no such orders,” said various voices, reproaching one another.

“That’s what I told you,” said Alpatuitch, reassuming his rights. “’T’was n’t right of you, boys.”

“Our foolishness, Yakof Alpatuitch,” replied the voices, and the crowd immediately began to break up and scatter to their homes.

The two muzhiks, with their arms bound, were taken to the master’s house. The two drunken men followed.

“Ekh! now I get a good look at you!” said one of them, addressing Karp.

“How could you speak to your betters in that way? What were you thinking of? Durak! idiot!” exclaimed the other. “Truly you were an idiot!”

Inside of two hours the teams were ready in the dvor of the Bogucharovo mansion. The men were zealously lugging out and packing up the master’s belongings, and Dron, at the princess’s intercession let out of the shed where he had been locked up, directed the muzhiks at their work, standing in the court.

“Don’t pack that away so clumsily,” said one of the muzhiks, a tall man, with a round, smiling face, taking a casket from the hands of a chambermaid. "You see, that’s worth something. Don’t sling it in that way, or poke it under a pile of rope — why, it’ll get spoiled! I don’t like it that way. Let everything be done neat, according to law! There, that’s the way — under this mat, and tuck hay round it. That’s the way to do it!"

1 Barsky dvor.

"Oh, these books! these books!" exclaimed another muzhik, bending under the weight of the bookcases from Prince Andrei’s library. "Don’t you touch them! Heavy, I tell you, boys! healthy lot of books!"

"Yes, that man kept his pen busy, and did n’t gad much," said the tall, moon-faced muzhik, winking significantly, and pointing to some lexicons lying on top.

Rostof, not wishing to impose his acquaintance on the princess, did not return to her, but remained in the village, waiting for her to pass on her way. Having waited until the Princess Mariya’s carriages had left the house, Rostof mounted and accompanied her on horseback along the highway occupied by our troops for a dozen versts.

At Yankovo, where his bivouac was, he politely took leave of her, and for the first time permitted himself the liberty of kissing her hand.

"Ought you not to be ashamed of yourself!" replied Rostof, reddening, as the Princess Mariya expressed her gratitude for his having saved her—for so she spoke of what he had done. "Any policeman would have done as much. If we had only peasants to fight with, we should not have let the enemy advance so far," said he, feeling a twinge of shame, and anxious to change the topic. "I am only delighted that this has given me a chance of making your acquaintance. Farewell, — prashchařte, princess. I wish you all happiness and consolation, and I hope that we shall meet under more favorable circumstances. If you wish to spare my blushes, please do not thank me."

But the princess, if she did not thank him further in word, could not help expressing her gratitude in every feature of her face, which fairly beamed with acknowledgment and gentleness. She could not believe him when he said that she had nothing for which to thank him. On the contrary, it was beyond question that if it had not been for him, she would have been utterly lost either at the hands of the insurgent peasants, or the French; that he, in order to rescue her, had exposed himself to the most palpable and terrible peril; and still less was it a matter of doubt that he was a man of high, noble spirit, capable of realizing her position and misfortune. His kindly, honest eyes, which had filled with sympathetic tears when she herself was weeping, and seemed to speak with her about her loss, she could not keep out of her thoughts.

1 Stanovoi.

When she bade him farewell, and was left alone, the Princess Mariya suddenly felt her eyes fill with tears, and then, it seemed not for the first time, the strange question came into her mind, "Did she love him?"

During the rest of the journey to Moscow, though her position was far from agreeable, the princess, as Dunyasha, who rode with her in the carriage, more than once observed, looked out of the window and smiled a sweet and melancholy smile.

"Well, supposing I did fall in love with him," mused the Princess Mariya.

Mortifying as it was for her to acknowledge to herself that she fell in love at first sight with a man who, perhaps, might never reciprocate her love, still she comforted herself with the thought that no one would ever know it, and that she would not be to blame if, even to the end of her life, she, without ever telling any one, loved this man whom she loved for the first time and the last.

Sometimes she recalled his looks, his sympathetic interest, his words, and happiness seemed to her not impossible. And it was at such times that Dunyasha observed that she smiled as she gazed out of the carriage window.

"And it was fate that he should come to Bogucharovo, and at such a time!" said the Princess Mariya. "And it was fate that his sister should jilt Prince Andrey!"
And in all this the Princess Mariya saw the workings of Providence.

The impression made on Rostof by the Princess Mariya was very agreeable. When his thoughts recurred to her, happiness filled his heart; and when his comrades, learning of his adventure at Bogucharovo, joked him because, in going after hay, he had fallen in with one of the richest heiresses of Russia, Rostof lost his temper. He lost his temper for the very reason that the idea of marrying the princess, who had impressed him so pleasantly, and who had such an enormous property, had more than once, against his will, occurred to him. As far as he personally was concerned, he could not wish a better wife than the Princess Mariya. To marry her would give great delight to the countess, his mother, and would help him to extricate his father's affairs from their wreck; and then, again,—Nikolaï felt this,—it would be for the Princess Mariya's happiness.

But Sonya? And his plighted troth? And that was the reason Rostof grew angry when they joked him about the Princess Bolkonskaya.

CHAPTER XV

Having accepted the command of the armies, Kutuzof remembered Prince Andreï, and sent word to him to join him at headquarters.

Prince Andreï reached Tsarevo-Zaïmishche on the very day and at the very time when Kutuzof was making his first review of the troops. He stopped in the village, at the house of a priest, in front of which the chief commander's carriage was standing, and took his seat on the bench in front of the door, waiting for his "serene highness," as every one now called Kutuzof. From the field back of the village came the sound of martial music, then the roar of a tremendous throng of men shouting, "Hurrah! Hurrah!" in honor of the commander-in-chief.

1 Svielleiši.
A dozen steps or so from Prince Andrei stood two of Kutuzof's servants,—the courier and his house-steward,—profiting by the prince's absence and the beautiful weather to come out to the gates.

A dark-complexioned little lieutenant-colonel of hussars, with a portentous growth of mustache and side-whiskers, came riding up to the gates, and, seeing Prince Andrei, asked if his serene highness lodged there, and if he would soon return.

Prince Andrei replied that he did not belong to his serene highness's staff, and had, likewise, only just arrived.

The lieutenant-colonel turned to the spruce-looking denshchik with the same question; and the chief commander's denshchik answered him with that contemptuous indifference with which the servants of commanders-in-chief are apt to treat under-officers.

"What? His serene highness? Likely to be here before long. What do you want?"

The lieutenant-colonel laughed in his mustaches at the denshchik's tone, dismounted from his horse, gave the bridle to his orderly, and joined Bolkonsky, making him a stiff little bow. Bolkonsky made room for him on the bench. The lieutenant-colonel of hussars sat down next him.

"So you're waiting for the commander-in-chief, too, are you?" asked the lieutenant-colonel. "He's reported to be vewy accessible! Thank God for that! That was the twouble with those sausage-stuffers. There was some weason in Yermolof asking to be weckoned as a German. Now pe'w'aps we 'Ussians may have something to say about things now. The devil knows what they've been doing! Always wetweating—always wetweating! Have you been making the campaign?" he asked.

"I have had that pleasure," replied Prince Andrei. "Not only have I taken part in the retreat, but I have lost thereby all that I hold dear, to say nothing of my property and the home of my ancestors.... my father, who died of grief. I am from Smolensk."
"Ah? Are you Prince Bolkonsky? Wight glad to make your acquaintance:—Lieutenant-Colonel Denisof, better known as Vaska," said Denisof, shaking hands with Prince Andreï, and looking with a peculiarly gentle expression into his face. "Yes, I heard about it," said he, sympathetically; and, after a short pause, he continued: "And so this is Scythian warfare. It's all vewy good except for those whose wibs are bwoken. And you are Prince AndweT Bolkonsky?" He shook his head. "Vewy, vewy glad, pwince, vewy glad to make your acquaintance," he repeated for the second time, squeezing his hand.

Prince Andreï had known from Natasha that Denisof was her first suitor. This recollection, at once sweet and bitter, brought back to him those painful sensations which of late he had not allowed himself to harbor, but which were always in his heart. Recently so many other and more serious impressions—like the evacuation of Smolensk, his visit to Luisiya Gorui, the news of his father's death—and so many new sensations had been experienced by him, that it was some time since he had even thought of his disappointment, and now, when he was reminded of it, it seemed so long ago that it did not affect him with its former force.

For Denisof, also, the series of recollections conjured up in his mind by Bolkonsky's name belonged to a distant, poetic past, to that time when he, after the supper, and after Natasha had sung for him, himself not realizing what he was doing, offered himself to a maiden of fifteen! He smiled at his recollection of that time and of his love for Natasha, and immediately proceeded to the topic which at the present passionately occupied him to the exclusion of everything else.

This was a plan of campaign which he had developed during the retreat, while on duty at the outposts. He had proposed this plan to Barclay de Tolly, and was now bent on proposing it to Kutuzof. The plan was based on the fact that the French line of operations was too widely spread out, and his idea was that, instead of attacking them in front, or, possibly, in connection with offensive attacks at the front, so as to block their road, it was necessary to act against their communications. He began to outline this plan to Prince Andrei.

"They can't sustain such a long line. It is impossible! I'll promise to break through them; give me five hundred men and I'll cut my way through, truly. A sort of system of guillotines."

Denisof had got up in his excitement, and as he laid his plan before Bolkonsky he gesticulated eagerly. In the midst of his exposition, the acclamations of the military, more than ever incoherent, more than ever diffused and mingled with music and songs, were heard in the direction of the review-grounds. The trampling of horses and shouts were heard in the village.

"Here he comes," shouted the Cossack guard. Bolkonsky and Denisof went down to the gates, where were gathered a little knot of soldiers, composing the guard of honor, and saw Kutuzof coming down the street, mounted on his little bay cob. An enormous suite of generals accompanied him; Barclay de Tolly was riding almost abreast of him. A throng of officers followed them and closed in around them on all sides, shouting "Hurrah!"

His aides galloped on ahead of him into the yard. Kutuzof, impatiently spurring his steed, which cantered along heavily under his weight, kept nodding his head and raising his hand to his white cavalier-guard cap, which was decorated with a red band and was without a vizor. As he came up to his guard of honor, composed of gallant grenadiers,—for the most part cavalrymen,—who presented arms, he for an instant gazed silently and shrewdly at them with the stubborn look of one used to command, and turned back to the throng of generals and other officers standing around him. Over his face suddenly passed an artful expression; he shrugged his shoulders with a gesture of perplexity.

"The idea of retreating, and retreating with such gallant fellows!" said he. "Well, good-by, general,"

1 Da svidanya. he added, and turned his horse into the gates, past Prince Andreï and Denisof.

“Hurrah! hurrah! hurrah!” The acclamations rent the air behind him.

Kutuzof, since Prince Andreï had last seen him, had grown stouter than ever; his face was wrinkled and he fairly weltered in fat. But the whitened eye, and the scar, and that expression of lassitude in face and figure, which he knew so well, were the same. He was dressed in a military long coat, a whip hung by a slender ribbon over his shoulder, and he wore his white cavalier-guard cap. Heavily sprawled out and swaying, he sat his little horse. His fiu—fiu—fiu could be heard almost distinctly as he rode into the courtyard.

His face had that expression of relief which a man shows when he makes up his mind to have a rest after a public exhibition. He extricated his left leg from the stirrup, leaned back with his whole body, and, scowling with the exertion of getting his leg up over the saddle, rested with his knee a moment, and then with a quack like a duck he let himself down into the arms of the Cossacks and aides who were waiting to assist him.

He straightened himself up, looked around with blinking eyes, and, glancing at Prince Andreï, but evidently failing to recognize him, he set out with his clumsy, plunging gait for the steps. Fiü—fiu—fiu—he puffed, and again he glanced at Prince Andreï. The impression made by Prince Andreï’s face, though it was reached only after several seconds,—as is often the case with old men,—at last connected itself with the recollection of who he was.

“Ah! how are you, prince, how are you, my good fellow?¹ come with me,” he said wearily, glancing round, and beginning heavily to mount the steps, which groaned under his weight. Then he unbuttoned his uniform and sat down on the bench at the top of the steps.

“Well, how is your father?”

“Yesterday I received news of his death,” said Prince Andreï, abruptly.

¹ Galubchik.
Kutuzof looked at Prince Andrei with startled, wide-opened eyes; then he took off his cap and crossed himself.

"The kingdom of heaven be his. God's will be done to us all."

He drew a deep, heavy sigh and was long silent. "I loved him dearly and I realized his worth, and I sympathize with you with all my heart."

He embraced Prince Andrei, pressed him to his fat chest, and held him there long. When at last he released him, Prince Andrei saw that his blubbery lips trembled, and that his eyes were full of tears. He sighed and took hold of the bench with both hands so as to rise.

"Come, come to my room, and let us talk!" said he; but just at that instant Denisof, who was as little apt to quail before his superiors as before his enemies, strode with jingling spurs to the steps, in spite of the aides, who with indignant whispers tried to stop him. Kutuzof, still clinging to the bench, gave him a displeased look.

Denisof, introducing himself, explained that he had something of the greatest importance for the good of the country to communicate to his serene highness. Kutuzof, with his weary look, continued to stare at Denisof, and, with a gesture of annoyance, released his hands and folded them on his belly, repeating: "For the good of the country? — Well, what is it? Speak!"

Denisof reddened like a girl,—it was so strange to see the blush on the veteran's mustached, bibulous face,—and he began boldly to evolve his plan for breaking through the enemy's effective line between Smolensk and Viazma. Denisof's home was in this region, and he was well acquainted with every locality. His plan seemed unquestionably excellent, especially owing to the force of conviction which he put into his words. Kutuzof regarded his own legs, and occasionally looked over into the dvor, or yard, of the adjoining cottage, as if he were expecting something unpleasant to appear from there. And in reality, from the cottage at which he was looking, during Denisof's speech, emerged a general with a portfolio under his arm.

"What?" exclaimed Kutuzof, interrupting Denisof in the midst of his exposition. "Ready so soon?"

"Yes, your serene highness," replied the general. Kutuzof shook his head as much as to say, 'How can one man have time for all this?' and went on listening to Denisof.

"I give my twuest word of honor as a 'Ussian officer," insisted Denisof, "that I will cut off Napoleon's communications."

"What! is Kirill Andreyevitch Denisof, Ober-intendant, any relation of yours?" asked Kutuzof, interrupting him.

"My own uncle, your serene highness."

"Oh, we were good friends," exclaimed Kutuzof, jovially. "Very good, very good, my dear. Stay here at headquarters; we will talk it over to-morrow."

Nodding to Denisof, he turned away, and stretched out his hand for the papers which Konovnitsuin had brought him.

"Would not your serene highness find it more comfortable to come into the house?" suggested the officer of the day, in a dissatisfied tone. "It's absolutely necessary to look over some plans, and to sign a number of documents."

An aide, appearing at the door, announced that his rooms were all ready. But Kutuzof evidently wanted not to go indoors until he was free. He scowled.

"No, have a table brought out, my dear; I'll look at them here," said he. — "Don't you go," he added, addressing Prince Andrei. Prince Andrei remained on the steps, and listened to the officer of the day.

During the rendering of the report, Prince Andrei heard in the passageway the whispering of a woman's voice and the rustling of a woman's silken gown. Several times, as he glanced in that direction, he caught sight of a round, ruddy-faced, pretty woman, in a pink dress, and with a lilac silk handkerchief over her head.

\[1\] Galubchik.
holding a dish in her hands, and evidently waiting for the return of the commander-in-chief. One of Kutuzof's aides explained to Prince Andrei in a whisper that this was the mistress of the house, the pope's wife, who was all ready to offer his serene highness the khleb-sol.\(^1\) Her husband had already met his highness with the cross at the church, and here she was at home with the bread and salt.

"Very pretty," added the aide, with a smile. Kutuzof looked up on hearing that. He had been listening to the general's report, — the principal feature of which was a critique on the position at Tsarevo-Zaimishche, — just exactly as he had listened to Denisof, just exactly as he had listened to the discussions at the council on the night before the battle of Austerlitz, seven years previously. It was evident that he listened merely because he had ears, which could not help hearing, although one of them was stuffed full of tarred hemp; but it was plain that nothing that the general on duty could say could either arouse him or interest him, and that he knew in advance what would be said, and listened only because he had to listen, as he might have to listen to the singing of a Te Deum.

All that Denisof said was practical and sensible. What the general on duty said was still more practical and sensible, but it was evident that Kutuzof scorned both knowledge and sense, and took for granted that something else was needed to decide the matter; something else, and quite independent of sense and knowledge.

Prince Andrei attentively watched the expression of the chief commander's face, and the only expression which he could distinguish in it was one of tedium, or of curiosity as to the meaning of a woman's whispering inside the door, and the desire to save appearances.

It was evident that Kutuzof scorned sense and knowledge, and even the patriotic feeling shown by Denisof, but that he did not scorn them by his own superior sense and knowledge and feeling — for he did not try to manifest these qualities, but he scorned them for some other reason. He scorned them because of his advanced age, because of his experience of life.

\(^1\) Bread and salt, typical of Russian hospitality.

The one single disposition which Kutuzof felt called on to make in connection with this report related to the marauding of the Russian soldiers. The general on duty, on finishing his report, presented to his serene highness, to sign, a paper granting a favorable answer to a proprietor who had petitioned for the military authorities to reimburse him for the loss of his standing oats, which had been taken on requisition.

Kutuzof smacked his lips and shook his head when he heard about this.

"Into the stove with it.... burn it! I tell you, once and for all, my dear," said he, "throw all such things into the fire. Let 'em reap the grain and burn the wood as they need. I don't order it, and I don't allow it; but if it is done, I can't pay for it. It can't be helped. 'If wood is cut, the chips fly.'¹ He glanced once more at the paper. "Oh, German punctilio!" he exclaimed, shaking his head.

CHAPTER XVI

"Well, that is all, is it?" asked Kutuzof, affixing his name to the last of the documents; and, rising laboriously and settling the folds of his white, puffy neck, he went to the door with a cheerful face.

The pope's wife, with flushed face, grasped for the plate, which, though she had prepared it so long in advance, she nevertheless failed to present in time. And, with a low obeisance, she offered the bread and salt to Kutuzof. Kutuzof's eyes twinkled; he smiled, chucked her under the chin, and said:—

"What a pretty woman you are! Thanks, sweet-heart!"²

He drew out of his trousers pocket a few gold pieces,

¹ Drova rubyat, shchepti leytat, Russian proverb.
² Galubushka.
and laid them in the plate. "Well, then, how are we situated?" said he, going toward the room reserved for his private use.

The pope's wife, with every dimple in her rosy face smiling, followed him into the chamber.

An aide came to Prince Andreï, as he stood on the steps, and invited him to breakfast. In half an hour he was again summoned to Kutuzof. Kutuzof was sprawled out in an easy-chair, with his uniform coat unbuttoned. He held a French book in his hand, and, when Prince Andreï came in, he laid it down, marking the place with a knife. This book, as Prince Andreï could see by the cover, was "Les Chevaliers du Cygne," a work by Madame de Genlis.

"Well, now, sit down, sit down here," said Kutuzof. "It's sad, very sad. But, remember, my boy, that I am a father to you—a second father." ....

Prince Andreï told Kutuzof all that he knew about his father's death, and what he had seen at Luisiya Gorui as he passed through.

"To what—to what have they brought us!" suddenly exclaimed Kutuzof, in an agitated voice, evidently getting from Prince Andreï's story a clear notion of the state in which Russia found herself.

"Wait a bit! wait a bit!" he added, with a wrathful expression; and then, evidently not wishing to dwell on this agitating topic, he went on to say:

"I have summoned you to keep you with me."

"I thank your serene highness," replied Prince Andreï. "But I fear that I am not good for staff service," he explained, with a smile which Kutuzof remarked. "And chiefly," added Prince Andreï, "I am used to my regiment. I have grown very fond of the officers, and the men, so far as I can judge, are fond of me. I should be sorry to leave my regiment. If I decline the honor of being on your staff, believe me, it is...."

A keen, good-natured, and at the same time shrewdly sarcastic expression flashed over Kutuzof's puffy face. He interrupted Bolkonsky.

"I am sorry. You might have been useful to me; but you are right, you are right. We don't need men here! There are everywhere plenty of advisers, but not of men. Our regiments would be very different if all the advice-givers would serve in them as you do. I remember you at Austerlitz—I remember you, I remember you with the standard," said Kutuzof; and a flush of pleasure spread over Prince Andrei's face at this recollection. Kutuzof drew him close, and stroked his cheek, and again Prince Andrei observed tears in his eyes. Though Prince Andrei knew that tears were Kutuzof's weak point, and that he was especially flattering to him, and was anxious to express his sympathy for his loss, still Prince Andrei felt particularly happy and gratified at this allusion to Austerlitz.

"Go, and God bless you! I know, your road.... is the road of honor."

He paused.

"I missed you sadly at Bukarest. I needed a messenger to send."

And, changing the conversation, Kutuzof began to talk about the Turkish war and the peace which had been concluded.

"Yes, they abused me not a little," said he, "both for the war and for the peace; but all came about in time. All things come to those who wait. There I had just as many advisers as I have here"....he went on to say, turning to the counselors, who evidently were an annoyance to him. "Okh! these counselors, these counselors!" he exclaimed. "If their advice had been taken, we should still be in Turkey, and peace would not have been signed, and the war would not be over yet. Everything in haste, but 'fast never gets far.' If Kamiensky had not died, he would have been ruined. He stormed a fortress with thirty thousand men. It is not hard to take a fortress; it's hard to gain a campaign. And to do that, not to storm and attack, but patience and time are what is required. Kamiensky sent his soldiers against Rushchuk; and while I employed nothing but time and patience, I took more fortresses than Kamiensky ever did, and I made the Turks feed on horse-flesh." He shook his head. "And the French will do the same. Take my word for it," he exclaimed, growing more animated, and pounding his chest, "if I have anything to do with it, they will be eating horse-flesh too!"

And again his eyes overflowed with tears.

"Still, it will be necessary to accept a battle, won't it?" asked Prince Andrei.

"Certainly, if all demand it, there's no help for it. But trust me, my boy. There are no more powerful fighters than these two, — Time and Patience; they do everything. But our advisers — they won't see it in that light, that's the trouble. Some are in favor, and some are opposed. What's to be done?" he asked, and waited for an answer. "Yes, what is it you advise doing?" he repeated, and his eyes gleamed with an expression of deep cunning. "I will tell you what is to be done," he went on to say, when Prince Andrei still refrained from expressing any opinion. "I will tell you what is to be done, and I shall do it. Dans le doute, mon cher," — he hesitated, — "abstiens-toi. When in doubt, don't," he repeated, after an interval. "Well, good-by, prashchai, my dear boy. Remember that I sympathize with all my heart in your loss, and that to you I am not his serene highness nor prince nor commander-in-chief, but a father to you. If you want anything, apply directly to me. Good-by, my dear."

He again embraced and kissed him. And before Prince Andrei had actually reached the door, Kutuzof drew a long sigh of relief, and had resumed his unfinished novel by Madame de Genlis, "Les Chevaliers du Cygne."

Prince Andrei could not account to himself for the why or wherefore of it, but it was a fact that, after this interview with Kutuzof, he returned to his regiment much relieved as to the general course of affairs, and as to the wisdom of intrusting them to this man whom he had just seen. The more he realized the utter absence of all self-seeking in this old man, who seemed to have outlived ordinary passions, and whose intellect—that is, the power of coördinating events and drawing conclusions—had resolved itself into the one faculty of calmly holding in check the course of events, the more assured Prince Andreï felt that everything would turn out as it should.

"There is nothing personal about him. He won't give way to his imaginations; he won't do anything rash," said Prince Andreï to himself, "but he will listen to all suggestions; he will remember everything; he will have everything in its place; he will hinder nothing that is useful, and permit nothing that is harmful; he will remember that there is something more powerful and more tremendous than his will,—the inevitable course of events,—and he will have the brains to see them; he will have the ability to realize their significance, and, in view of this significance, he will be sensible enough to see what a small part he himself, and his own will, have to play in them. But chief of all," thought Prince Andreï, "what makes me have confidence in him is that he is Russian, in spite of his French romance of Madame de Genlis and his French phrases; because his voice trembled when he exclaimed, ‘What have they brought us to!’ and because he sobbed when he declared that he would make them eat horse-flesh."

It was due to this feeling, which all felt more or less vaguely, that Kutuzof’s selection as commander-in-chief, in spite of court cabals, met with such unanimous and general recognition among the people.

CHAPTER XVII

After the sovereign’s departure from Moscow, the life in the capital flowed on in its ordinary channels, and the current of this life was so commonplace that it was hard to recall those days of patriotic enthusiasms and impulses, and hard to believe that Russia was actually in peril, and that the members of the English Club were at the same time "Sons of the Fatherland," and had declared themselves prepared for any sacrifice.

The only thing that recalled the general spasm of patriotic enthusiasm that had taken place during the sovereign's recent visit to Moscow was the demand for men and money, which, coming now in legal, official form, had to be met, the sacrifice having once been offered.

Though the enemy were approaching Moscow, the Moscovites were not inclined to regard their situation with any greater degree of seriousness; on the contrary, the matter was treated with peculiar lightness, as is always the case with people who see a great catastrophe approaching.

At such a time, two voices are always heard speaking loudly in the heart of man: the one, with perfect reasonableness, always preaches the reality of the peril, and counsels him to seek for means of avoiding it; the other, with a still greater show of reason, declares that it is too painful and difficult to think about danger, since it is not in the power of man to foresee everything or to escape the inevitable course of events; and, therefore, it is better to shut the eyes to the disagreeable, until it actually comes, and to think only of what is pleasant.

When a man is alone, he generally gives himself up to the first voice, but in society, on the contrary, to the second. This was the case at the present time with the inhabitants of Moscow.

Moscow had not been so gay for a long time as it was that year. Rostopchin's placards, called affiches, or afishki, were read and criticized just as were the couplets of Vasili Lvovitch Pushkin. On the top of them

---

1 Vasili Lvovitch Pushkin, the uncle of the poet Aleksandr Sergyeyevich Pushkin, was born at Moscow in April, 1770; served in the bodyguard in the Izmailovsky regiment till 1797; began to contribute to the Petersburg Mercury, 1793; wrote an immense number of epistles, elegies, fables, epigrams, madrigals, etc. The war of 1812 sent him to Nizhni-Novgorod, where he remained till 1815. He died September 1, 1830, about seven years before his more famous namesake was killed. His best known work, "Opasnui Sosyed — A Dangerous Neighbor," has been thrice republished: Munich, 1815; Leipsic, 1855; Berlin, 1859.
were represented the picture of a drinking-house and the tapster and Moscovite meshchanin, Karpushka Chigirin, who, having been an old soldier, on hearing that Bonaparte was marching upon Moscow, fortified himself with a brimming nog of liquor in the shop, flew into a passion, heaped every sort of vile epithets on all the French, stepped forth from the drinking-house, and harangued the crowd collected under the eagle.

At the club, in the corner room, men collected to read these bulletins, and some were pleased when Karpushka make sport of the French, and said:

"They would swell up with cabbage, burst their bellies with kasha gruel, choke themselves with shchi, that they were all dwarfs, and that a peasant woman would toss three of them at once with a pitchfork."

Some, however, criticized this tone, and declared that it was rude and stupid. It was reported that Rostopchin had sent the French, and, indeed, all other foreigners, out of Moscow; that Napoleon had spies and agents among them; but this story was told merely for the sake of repeating certain sardonic words which Rostopchin was credited with saying about their destination. These foreigners were embarked on the Volga at Nizhni, and Rostopchin said to them:

"Creep into yourselves," — that is, keep out of sight — "creep on board the boat, and try not to let it become a Charon's bark for you."

It was also reported that the courts of justice had been removed from the city, and here there was a chance given for repeating one of Shinshin's jests, to the effect that for this, at least, Moscow ought to be grateful to Napoleon.

It was said that Mamonof's regiment would cost him eight hundred thousand, that Bezukhov was spending still more on his warriors; but the best joke of all was that the count himself was going to buckle on his uniform and ride in front of his regiment, and those who would be in the front would not sell their chances to see this great sight for any money.

"You have no mercy on any one," said Julie Drubetskaya, picking up and squeezing a bunch of picked lint between her slender fingers covered with rings.

Julie had determined to leave Moscow the next day, and she was giving her last reception. "Bezukhov is absurd, but he is so good, so kind! What is the pleasure to be so caustique?"

"Fined!" exclaimed a young man, in a militia uniform, whom Julie called "Mon chevalier," and who was going to accompany her to Nizhni.

In Julie's set, as in many other sets of Moscow society, it had been agreed to speak only in Russian, and those who forgot themselves and made use of French words in conversation, had to pay a fine, which was turned over to the committee of public defense.

"That's a double fine, for a Gallicism," said a Russian author who was in the drawing-room. "'Pleasure to be' is not good Russian."

"You show no mercy upon any one," pursued Julie, paying heed to the author's criticism.

"For using the word caustique, I admit my guilt, and will pay my fine for it, and for the pleasure to tell you the truth, I am ready to pay another fine; but for Gallicisms I am not to be held answerable," she said, turning to the author. "I have neither the money nor the time to hire a teacher and take Russian lessons, as Prince Galitsuin is doing."

"Ah, there he is," exclaimed Julie. "Quand on—No, no," said she to the militiaman, "do not count that one, I'll say it in Russian: 'When we speak of the sun we see his rays,'" said the hostess, giving Pierre a fascinating smile—"we were just talking about you. We were saying that your regiment would be really much better than Mamonof's," said she, with one of those white lies so characteristic of society women.

"Akh! don't speak to me about my regiment," replied Pierre, kissing the hostess's hand, and taking a chair near her. "I am tired to death of it."

"But surely you are going to take the command of it yourself?" asked Julie, shooting a glance of cunning and ridicule at the militiaman.
The militiaman in Pierre's presence was no longer so caustique, and his face expressed some perplexity at the meaning expressed in Julie's smile. In spite of his absent-mindedness and good humor, Pierre's personality immediately cut short all attempts to make a butt of him in his own presence.

"No," replied Pierre, with a glance down at his big, portly frame, "I should be too good a mark for the French, and I am afraid that I could not get on a horse."

Among those who came up as a subject for gossip in the course of the shifting conversation were the Rostofs.

"They say their affairs are in a very bad condition," remarked Julie. "And the count himself is so utterly lacking in common sense! The Razumovskys wanted to buy his house and his pod-Moskovnaya, and it is still in abeyance. He asks too much."

"No, I believe the sale was effected a few days ago," said some one. "Though now it is nonsense for any one to buy property in Moscow."

"Why?" asked Julie. "Do you imagine there is any real danger for Moscow?"

"What makes you go away?"

"I? That is an odd question. I am going because ... because .... well, I am going because everybody's going, and because I am not a Jeanne d'Arc and not an Amazon."

"There, now, give me some more rags."

"If he can only economize, he may be able to settle all his debts," pursued the militiaman, still speaking of Count Rostof.

"A good old man, but a very pauvre sire. And why have they been living here so long? They intended long ago to start for the country. Natalie, I believe, is perfectly restored to health? — Is n't she?" asked Julie of Pierre, with a mischievous smile.

"They are waiting for their youngest son," replied Pierre. "He was enrolled among Obolyensky's Cossacks and was sent to Byelaya Tserkov. The regiment was mobilizing there. But now he has been transferred to my regiment and is expected every day. The count wanted to start long ago, but the countess utterly refused to leave Moscow until her son came."

1 White Church.

"I saw them three days ago at the Arkharofs'. Natalie has grown very pretty again and was very gay. She sang a romanza. How easy it is for some people to forget everything."

"Forget what?" asked Pierre, impulsively.

Julie smiled.

"You know, count, that knights like you are to be found only in the romances of Madame de Souza."

"Oh, fie now! dear count, c'est la fable de tout Moscow. Je vous admire, ma parole d'honneur!"

"Fined! Fined!" exclaimed the militiaman.

"Very well, then! It's impossible to talk; how annoying!"

"What is the talk of all Moscow?" asked Pierre, angrily rising to his feet.

"Oh! fie! count. You know!"

"I don't know at all what you mean," said Pierre.

"I know that you and Natalie were good friends, and consequently.... No, I always liked Viera better. Cette chère Véra!"

"Non, Madame," pursued Pierre, in a tone of annoyance. "I have never in the slightest degree taken upon myself to play the rôle of knight to the Countess Rostova, and I have not been at their house for almost a month. But I do not understand the cruelty...."

"Qui s'excuse s'accuse," said Julie, smiling, and waving the lint; and, in order to have the last word herself, she abruptly changed the conversation. "What do you suppose I heard last night? Poor Marie Bolkonskaya arrived in Moscow yesterday. Have you heard? She has lost her father!"

"Really? Where is she? I should like very much to see her," said Pierre.

"I spent last evening with her. She is going to-day or to-morrow morning with her little nephew to their pod-Moskovnaya."

"But what about her? How is she?" insisted Pierre.

"Well, but sad. But do you know who rescued her? It's a perfect romance! Nicolas Rostof! Her people surrounded her; they would have killed her. She was already wounded. .... He rushed in and saved her." ....

"Lots of romances!" exclaimed the militiaman. "Really, this general stampede seems to have been made for providing husbands for all the old maids. Catiche is one, the Princess Bolkonskaya two...."

"Do you know, really I think that she is un petit peu amoureuse du jeune homme?"

"Fined! Fined! Fined!"

"But really, how do you say that in Russian?"  1

CHAPTER XVIII

When Pierre reached home he was handed two of Rostopchin's bulletins, which had been distributed that day.

In the first the count denied having forbidden any one to leave Moscow, and declared that, on the contrary, he was delighted to have ladies of rank and merchants' wives leave town. "Less panic, less gossip!" said the bulletin. "But I'll answer for it with my life that the villain will never be in Moscow."

By these words Pierre was for the first time fairly convinced that the French would get to Moscow.

The second placard proclaimed that our headquarters were at Viazma, that Count Wittgenstein had beaten the French, but that, as very many of the inhabitants had expressed a desire to arm themselves, there were plenty of weapons for them at the arsenal: sabers, pistols, muskets, — all of which the inhabitants might buy at the lowest prices.

The tone of this placard was not nearly so full of grim

1 The author answers that question by printing the Russian in a footnote: Nemnozhetchko vlyublena fetova molodova chelovyeeka.
humor as those which had been before attributed to the tapster Chigirin. Pierre pondered over these placards. Evidently that threatening storm-cloud which he looked forward to with all the powers of his soul, and which at the same time aroused in him involuntary horror — evidently this storm-cloud was drawing near.

"Shall I enter the military service and join the army, or shall I wait?" This question arose in his mind for the hundredth time. He took a pack of cards which was lying on the table near him, and began to lay out a game of patience.

"If this game comes out," said he to himself, as he shuffled the cards, held them in his hand and looked up — "if it comes out right, then it means.... What shall it mean?"

Before he had time to decide on what it should mean, he heard at the door of his cabinet the voice of the oldest princess, asking if she might come in.

"Well, it shall mean that I must join the army," said Pierre to himself. — "Come in, come in," he added, replying to the princess.

Only the oldest of the three princesses — the one with the long waist — continued to make her home at Pierre's; the two younger ones were married.

"Forgive me, mon cousin, for disturbing you," said she, in an agitated voice. "But you see it is high time to reach some decision. What is going to be the outcome of this? Every one is leaving Moscow, and the people are riotous. Why do we stay?"

"On the contrary, everything looks very propitious, ma cousine," said Pierre, in that tone of persiflage which, in order to hide his confusion at having to play the part of benefactor before the princess, he always adopted in his dealings with her.

"Yes, everything is propitious!.... Certainly a fine state of affairs! This very day Varvara Ivanovna was telling me how our armies had distinguished themselves. It brings them the greatest possible honor. But still the servants are exceedingly refractory; they won't obey at all; my maid — why, she was positively insolent! And before we know it they will be massacring us. It is impossible to go into the streets. But worst of all the French are liable to be here to-day or to-morrow! Why should we wait for them? I ask for only one favor, mon cousin," pleaded the princess. "Give orders to have me taken to Petersburg. Whatever I am, I cannot endure to live under the sway of Bonaparte!"

"There, there, ma cousine! Where have you got your information? On the contrary...."

"I will not submit to your Napoleon! Others may. .... If you do not wish to do this for me...."

"Yes, I will do it. I will give orders immediately."

The princess was evidently annoyed that she had no one to quarrel with. She sat on the edge of her chair, muttering to herself.

"Nevertheless, this has been reported to you all wrong," said Pierre. "All is quiet in the city, and there is not the slightest danger. Here, I was just this moment reading...." Pierre showed the princess Rostopchin's placards. "The count writes that he will answer for it on his life that the enemy shall never enter Moscow."

"Akh! this count of yours," exclaimed the princess, angrily. "He's a hypocrite, a rascal! who has himself been exciting the people to sedition. Wasn't he the one who wrote in these idiotic affiches that, if there was any one found, to take him by the topknot and drag him to the police office—how stupid! And whoever should take one should have glory and honor. That is a fine way of doing! Varvara Ivanovna told me that the mob almost killed her because she spoke French."

"Well, there's something in that. But you take everything too much to heart," said Pierre, and he began to lay out his patience.

His game of patience came out correctly, and yet Pierre did not join the army; but he remained in deserted Moscow, in the same fever of anxiety and indecision and fear, and, at the same time, joy, though he was expecting something horrible.

Toward evening of the following day the princess took her departure, and Pierre's head overseer came to him with the report that the money required by him for the equipment of his regiment could not possibly be raised except by selling one of his estates. The head overseer explained to him that such expensive caprices as fitting out regiments would be his ruin. Pierre, with difficulty repressing a smile, listened to the man's despair.

"Well, sell it, then," he replied. "There's no help for it now. I cannot go back on my promise now."

The worse the situation of affairs in general, and his own in particular, the more agreeable it was to Pierre; the more evident it seemed to him that the long-expected catastrophe was drawing near. Already there was almost none of his acquaintances left in town. Julie had gone; the Princess Mariya had gone. Of near acquaintances only the Rostofs were left; but Pierre stayed away from their house.

That day, in order to get a little recreation, Pierre drove out to the village of Vorontsovo to see a great air-balloon, which Leppich had built for the destruction of the enemy, and a trial balloon, which was to be let off on the next day. This balloon was not yet ready; but, as Pierre knew, it had been constructed at the sovereign's desire. The emperor had written to Count Rostopchin as follows, in regard to this balloon:

As soon as Leppich is ready, furnish him with a crew for his basket, composed of tried and intelligent men, and send a courier to General Kutuzof to inform him. I have already instructed him concerning the affair.

I beg of you to enjoin upon Leppich to be exceedingly careful where he descends for the first time, that he may not make any mistake and fall into the hands of the enemy. It is essential that he should coöperate with the commander-in-chief.

On his way home from Vorontsovo, as he was crossing the Bolotnaya Ploshchad, Pierre saw a great crowd collected around the Lobnoye Myesto, or place of executions; he stopped and got out of his drozhsky. They were watching the punishment of a French cook, charged with being a spy. The flogging had only just come to an end, and the executioner was untying from "the mare," or whipping-post, a stout man, with reddish side-whiskers, dressed in blue stockings and a green kamzol. He was piteously groaning. Another prisoner, lean and pallid, was also standing there. Both, to judge by their faces, were French. Pierre, with a face as scared and pale as that of the lean Frenchman, elbowed his way through the throng.

"What does this mean? Who is it? What have they done?" he demanded.

But the attention of the throng—chinovniks,burghers, merchants, peasants, and women in cloaks and furs—was so eagerly concentrated on what was taking place on the Lobnoye Myesto that no one replied to him.

The stout man straightened himself up, shrugged his shoulders with a scowl, and, evidently wishing to make a show of stoicism, and not looking around him, tried to put on his kamzol; but suddenly his lips trembled, and he burst into tears, as if he was angry at himself, just as full-grown men of sanguine temperament are apt to weep. The crowd gave vent to loud remarks—as it seemed to Pierre, for the sake of drowning their own sense of compassion.

"Some prince's cook...."

"Well, Moosioo, evidently Russian sauce goes well with a Frenchman.... Set your teeth on edge? Hey?" cried a wrinkled law clerk, standing near Pierre, as the Frenchman burst into tears. The law clerk glanced around, expecting applause for his sarcasm. A few laughed, a few continued to gaze with frightened curiosity at the executioner, who was stripping the second.

Pierre gave a snort, scowled deeply, and, swiftly returning to his drozhsky, kept muttering to himself even after he was once more seated. During the transit he several times shuddered, and cried out so loud that the driver asked him:

"What do you order?"
"Where on earth are you going?" shouted Pierre, as the coachman turned down the Lubyanka.

"You bade me drive to the governor-general's," replied the coachman.

"Idiot! ass!" screamed Pierre, berating his coachman as he scarcely ever had been known to do. "I ordered you to drive home, and make haste, you blockhead!... I have got to get off this very day," muttered Pierre to himself.

Pierre, at the sight of the flogged Frenchman and the throng surrounding the Lobnoye Myesto, had come to so definite a decision not to stay another day in Moscow, but to join the army immediately, that it seemed to him he had already spoken to his coachman about it, or at least that the coachman was in duty bound to have known it.

On reaching home Pierre gave his coachman, Yevstafyevitch, who knew everything, and could do everything, and was one of the notabilities of Moscow, orders to have his saddle-horses sent to Mozhaisk, where he was going that very day to join the army.

It was impossible to do everything on that one day, however, and accordingly Pierre, on Yevstafyevitch's representation, postponed his departure to the following day, so that relays of horses might be sent on ahead.

On the fifth of September foul weather was followed by fair, and that day after dinner Pierre left Moscow. In the evening, while stopping to change horses at Perkhushkovo, Pierre learned that a great battle had been fought that afternoon. He was told that there at Perkhushkovo the cannon had shaken the ground; but when Pierre inquired who had been victorious, no one could give him any information.

This was the battle of Shevardino, which was fought on the fifth of September.

By daybreak Pierre was at Mozhaisk. All the houses at Mozhaisk were filled with troops; and at the tavern, in the yard of which Pierre was met by his grooms and coachman, there were no rooms to be had. All the places were preëmpted by officers.
In the town and behind the town, everywhere, regiments were stationed or on the move. Cossacks, infantry, cavalry, baggage wagons, caissons, cannons, were to be seen on all sides.

Pierre made all haste to reach the front, and, the farther he went from Moscow, and the deeper he penetrated into this sea of troops, the more he was overcome by anxiety, disquietude, and a feeling of joy, such as he had never before experienced. It was somewhat akin to that which he had experienced at the Sloboisky palace, at the time of the sovereign’s visit,—a feeling that it was indispensable to do something and make some sacrifice.

He now felt the pleasant consciousness that all that constitutes the happiness of men—the comforts of life, wealth, even life itself—was rubbish, which it was a delight to renounce in favor of something else.

Still Pierre could not account to himself, and indeed he made no attempt to decide, for whom or for what the sacrifice of everything, which gave him such a sense of charm, was made. He did not trouble himself with the inquiry for what he wished to sacrifice himself; the mere act of sacrifice constituted for him a new and joyful feeling.

CHAPTER XIX

On the fifth of September was fought the battle at the redoubt of Shevardino; on the sixth not a single shot was fired on either side; on the seventh came the battle of Borodino.

For what purpose and how was it that these battles at Shevardino and Borodino were fought? Why was the battle of Borodino fought? Neither for the French nor for the Russians had it the slightest sense. The most immediate result was, and necessarily was, for the Russians an onward step toward the destruction of Moscow—a thing that we dreaded more than anything else in the world; and for the French an onward step toward the destruction of their entire army—a thing that they also dreaded more than anything else in the world. This result was even then, perfectly obvious, and yet Napoleon offered battle and Kutuzof accepted it.

If the commanders had been governed by motives of reason, it would seem as if it ought to have been clear to Napoleon that, at a distance of two thousand versts in an enemy’s country, to accept a battle under the evident risk of losing a quarter of his army was to march to certain destruction; and it should have been equally as clear to Kutuzof that, in accepting an engagement, and in likewise risking the loss of half of his army, he was actually losing Moscow. For Kutuzof this was mathematically demonstrable, just as in a game of checkers, if I have one draught less than my adversary, by exchanging I lose, and, therefore, I ought not to risk the exchange.

If my adversary has sixteen checkers, and I have fourteen, then I am only one-eighth weaker than he is; but when he and I have each lost thirteen draughts, then he becomes thrice as strong as I am.

Up to the battle of Borodino our forces were to the French in the approximate proportion of five to six, but after the battle, of one to two. That is, before the battle, 100,000 : 120,000; but after the battle 50 : 100. And yet the wise and experienced Kutuzof accepted battle.

Napoleon, also, the leader of genius, as he was called, offered battle, losing a fourth of his army, and still farther extending his line. If it be said that he expected, by the occupation of Moscow, to end the campaign, as he did in the case of Vienna, this theory can be rebutted by many proofs. The historians of Napoleon themselves admit that he was anxious to call a halt at Smolensk; that he knew the risk he ran in his extended position, and knew that the capture of Moscow would not be the end of the campaign, because he had seen, by the example of Smolensk, in what a state the Russian cities would be left to him, and he did not receive a single response to his reiterated offers for negotiations.

In offering and accepting the battle of Borodino, Kutuzof and Napoleon both acted contrary to their intentions and their good sense. But the historians have affected to fit to these accomplished facts an ingeniously woven tissue of proofs of the foresight and genius of these commanders, who, of all the involuntary instruments for the execution of cosmic events, were the most totally subject and involuntary.

The ancients left us examples of heroic poems in which the heroes themselves constitute all the interest of the story; and we cannot as yet accustom ourselves to the fact that history of this kind, applied to our own day, is wholly lacking in sense.

As to the second question: How came the battle of Borodino and the battle of Shevardino, which preceded it, to be fought? There exists an explanation just as positive and universally known, but absolutely fallacious. All the historians describe the affair as follows:—

The Russian army, in its retreat from Smolensk, sought the most favorable position for a general engagement, and found such a position at Borodino.

The Russians beforehand fortified this position at the left of the Moscow-Smolensk road, almost in a right angle from Borodino to Utitsa, the very point where the battle was fought.

In front of this position, to keep watch of the enemy, a fortified redoubt was established upon the hill of Shevardino. On the fifth of September, Napoleon attacked the redoubt, and took it by storm; September 7, he attacked the entire Russian army, which was then in position on the field of Borodino.

Thus it is described in the histories; and yet the whole thing is perfectly wrong, as any one may be easily convinced who will care to investigate the facts.

The Russians did not seek the most favorable position; but, on the contrary, in their retreat they passed by many positions which were more favorable than the one at Borodino. They did not halt at any one of these positions, because Kutuzof would not occupy any position he had not himself selected, and because the popular demand for an engagement was not yet expressed with sufficient force; and because Miloradovitch had not come up with the militia; and for many other reasons besides, too numerous to mention.

It is a fact that the former positions were superior in strength, and that the position at Borodino—the one where the battle was fought—was not only not strong, but was in no respect superior to any other position in the whole Russian empire, such as one might at haphazard point out on the map with a pin.

The Russians not only did not fortify their position on the field of Borodino, at the left, at a right angle to the road,—in other words, at the place where the battle took place,—but, moreover, up to the sixth of September, they never even dreamed of the possibility of a battle taking place there.

This is proved, in the first place, by the fact that until the sixth of September there were no fortifications on the ground; but, moreover, the defenses begun on the sixth were not even completed on the seventh.

In the second place, this is proved by the position of the Shevardino redoubt: a redoubt at Shevardino, in front of the position where the battle was accepted, had no sense. Why was this redoubt fortified more strongly than all the other points? And why were the troops weakened, and six thousand men sacrificed, in vain attempts to hold this position until late on the night of the fifth? For all observations of the enemy, a Cossack patrol would have been sufficient.

In the third place, that the position where the battle was fought was not a matter of foresight, and that the Shevardino redoubt was not the advanced work of this position, is proved by the fact that Barclay de Tolly and Bagration, up to the sixth instant, were convinced that the Shevardino redoubt was the left flank of the position; and even Kutuzof himself, in his report, written in hot haste after the battle, calls the Shevardino redoubt the left flank of the position.

It was only some time subsequently, when the report of the battle of Borodino was written, with abundant time for reflection, that, probably for the sake of smoothing over the blunder of the commander-in-chief, who had to be held infallible, the false and strange ideas were promulgated that the Shevardino redoubt made the advanced post—when, in reality, it was only an intrenchment on the left flank; and that the battle of Borodino was accepted by us in a position well fortified, and selected in advance—when, in reality, it was fought in a position perfectly unpremeditated, and almost unfortified.

The affair, evidently, happened this way: a position was selected on the river Kalotcha, where it crosses the highroad, not at right, but at acute angles, so that the left flank was at Shevardino, the right not far from the village of Novoye, and the center at Borodino, near the confluence of the rivers Kalotcha and Voïna. That this was the position, covered by the river Kalotcha, for an army having for its end to check an enemy moving along the Smolensk highway, against Moscow, must be evident to any one who studies the battle-field of Borodino, and forgets how the battle really took place.

Napoleon, who reached Valuyev on the fifth of September, failed—so the histories tell us—to discover the position of the Russians, stretching from Utitsa to Borodino,—he could not have discovered this position because there was no such position,—and did not discover the advanced post of the Russian army, but, in pursuing the Russian rear-guard, he drove them in on the left flank of the position of the Russians at the Shevardino redoubt, and, unexpectedly to the Russians, crossed the Kalotcha with his troops. And the Russians, not having succeeded in bringing on a general engagement, withdrew their left wing from a position which they had intended to hold, and took up another position, which was not anticipated and not fortified.

Napoleon, having crossed over to the left bank of the Kalotcha at the left of the highway, transferred the ensuing battle from the right to the left (relative to the Russians) and brought it into the field between Utitsa, Semenovskoye, and Borodino,—into a field which had no earthly advantage over any other field that might have been chosen at random anywhere in Russia,—and on this field was fought the whole battle of the seventh.
Roughly sketched, the plan of the imaginary battle and of the actual battle is here appended:

If Napoleon had not reached the Kalotcha on the afternoon of the fifth and had not given orders immediately to storm the redoubt, but had postponed the attack until the next morning, no one could seriously doubt that the Shevardino redoubt would have been the left flank of our position, and the battle would have been fought as we expected. In such a contingency, we should have defended still more stubbornly the Shevardino redoubt as being our left flank; we should have attacked Napoleon at his center or right, and on the fifth of September there would have been a general engagement in that position which had been previously selected and defended.

But as the attack on our left flank was made in the afternoon, after the retreat of our rear-guard, that is to say, immediately after the skirmish at Gridneva, and as the Russian leaders would not or could not begin a general engagement in the afternoon of the fifth, therefore the principal action of the battle of Borodino was already practically lost on the fifth, and undoubtedly led to the loss of the battle that was fought on the seventh.

After the loss of the Shevardino redoubt on the morning of the sixth, we were left without any position on our left flank, and were reduced to the necessity of straightening our left wing and of making all haste to fortify it as best we could.

But, in spite of the fact that the Russian troops on the seventh of September were protected by feeble, unfinished intrenchments, the disadvantage of this situation was still further enhanced by the Russian leaders' refusing to recognize a condition of things settled beyond a peradventure, namely, the loss of their defenses on the left flank and the transfer of the whole ensuing engagement from right to left, and remaining in their altogether too extended position from Novoye to Utitsa; and the consequence was they were obliged, during the engagement, to transfer their troops from right to left.

Thus, throughout the engagement, the Russians had the entire force of the French army directed against their left wing, which was not half as strong.

Poniatowski's demonstration against Utitsa and Uvarovo on the right flank of the French was independent of the general course of the battle.

Thus the battle of Borodino was fought in a way entirely different from the descriptions of it which were written for the purpose of glossing over the mistakes of our leaders and consequently dimming the glory of the Russian army and people. The battle of Borodino did not take place on a selected and fortified position, or with forces only slightly disproportioned; but the battle, in consequence of the loss of the Shevardino redoubt, was accepted by the Russians at an exposed and almost unfortified position, with forces doubly strong opposed to them,—in other words, under conditions whereby it was not only unfeasible to fight ten hours and then leave the contest doubtful, but unfeasible to keep the army even three hours from absolute confusion and flight.

CHAPTER XX

Pierre left Mozhaïsk on the morning of the seventh. On the monstrously steep and precipitous hillside down which winds the road from the city, just beyond the cathedral which crowns the hill on the right, where service was going on and the bells were pealing, Pierre dismounted from his carriage and proceeded on foot.

Behind him came, laboriously letting themselves down, a regiment of cavalry led by its singers.

A train of telyegas, full of men wounded in the last evening's engagement, met him on its way up the hill. The peasant drivers, shouting at their horses and lashing them with their knouts, ran from one side to the other. The telyegas, on which lay or sat three and four wounded soldiers, bumped over the rough stones which were scattered about and did duty as a causeway on the steep road. The soldiers, bandaged with rags, pale, and with compressed lips and knit brows, clung to the sides as they were bounced and jolted in the carts. Nearly all of them looked with naïve, childlike curiosity at Pierre's white hat and green coat.

Pierre's coachman shouted angrily to the ambulance train to keep to one side. The cavalry regiment with their singers, as they came down the hill, overtook Pierre's drozhsky and blocked up the whole road. Pierre halted, squeezing himself to the very edge of the road, which was hollowed out of the hillside. The hillside shelved over, and as the sun did not succeed in penetrating into this ravine, it was cool and damp there. Over Pierre was the bright August morning sky, and the merry pealing of the chimes rang through the air.

One team with its load of wounded drew up at the edge of the road near where Pierre had halted. The teamster, in his bast shoes, and puffing with the exercise, came running up with some stones, and hastily blocked the hind wheels, which were untired, and proceeded to arrange the breeching of his little, patient horse.

An old soldier who had been wounded and had one arm in a sling, and was following the telyega on foot, took hold of it with his sound hand and looked at Pierre.

"Say, friend,¹ will they leave us here, or is it to Moscow?"

Pierre was so absorbed in his thoughts that he did not hear what the man said. He stared now at the cavalry regiment, which had met face to face with the ambulance train, and now at the telyega, which had halted near him with two wounded men sitting up and one lying down, and it seemed to him that here was the definite solution of the question that perplexed him so.

One of the two soldiers sitting in the cart had been evidently wounded in the cheek. His whole head was bound up in rags, and one cheek was swollen up as big as the head of a child. His mouth and nose were all on one side. This soldier looked at the cathedral, and crossed himself.

The other, a young lad, a raw recruit, light complexioned, and as pale as if his delicate face was completely bloodless, gazed at Pierre with a fixed, good-natured smile.

The third was lying down, and his face was hidden.

The cavalry singers had now come abreast of the telyega:—

"Akh! zapropala — da yezhova golova.... Da! na chuzhoui storone zhivutchi."....

¹ Zemliatchek, affectionate diminutive of zemliak, countryman, fellow-countryman.
"Yes, living in a foreign land," rang out the voices, trolling a soldier's dancing-song. As if echoing the merry song, but in a different strain, far up from the heights above pealed the metallic sounds of the cathedral chimes. And, in still another strain of gayety, the bright sunbeams flooded the summit of the acclivity over opposite. But under the hillside where Pierre stood, near the telyega with the wounded men and the little panting horse, it was damp, and in shadow and in gloom.

The soldier with the swollen cheek looked angrily at the cavalry singers.

"Okh! the dandies!" he muttered scornfully.

"I have seen something besides soldiers to-day: muzhiks is what I have seen! Muzhiks, and whipped into battle, too!" said the soldier standing behind the telyega, and turning to Pierre with a melancholy smile.

"Not much picking and choosing nowadays. They are trying to sweep in the whole nation—in one word, Moscow. They want to do it at one fell swoop."

In spite of the incoherence of the soldier's words, Pierre understood all that he meant, and he nodded his head affirmatively.

The road was at last cleared, and Pierre walked to the foot of the hill, and then proceeded on his way. He drove along, glancing at both sides of the road, trying to distinguish some familiar face, and everywhere encountering only strangers belonging to the various divisions of the troops, who, without exception, looked with amazement at his white hat and green coat.

After proceeding about four versts he met his first acquaintance, and joyfully accosted him. This acquaintance was one of the army physicians. Pierre met him as he came driving along in his britchka, accompanied by a young doctor, and when he recognized Pierre he ordered the Cossack who was seated on the box in place of his coachman to stop.

"Count! your illustriousness! How come you here?" asked the doctor.

"Why, I wanted to see what was going on."
“Well, you’ll have enough to see.” ....

Pierre got out again, and paused to talk with the doctor, to whom he confided his intention of taking part in the battle.

The doctor advised Bezukhóí to apply directly to his serene highness. “God knows what would become of you during a battle if you are not with friends,” said he, exchanging glances with his young colleague; “but his serene highness, of course, knows you, and will receive you graciously. I’d do that if I were you, batyushka,” said the doctor.

The doctor looked tired and sleepy.

“You think so, do you? .... But I was going to ask you .... where is our position?” said Pierre.

“Our position?” repeated the doctor. “That is something that is not in my line. Go to Tatarinovo. Lot of them digging something or other there. There you’ll find a mound, and from the top of it you can get a good view,” said the doctor.

“A good view?” .... repeated Pierre. “If you would only ....”

But the doctor interrupted him, and turned to his britchka.

“I would show you the way; yes, I would, by God .... but” — and the doctor indicated his throat — “I am called to a corps commander. You see how it is with us! .... You know, count, there’s to be a battle to-morrow: out of a hundred thousand, we must count on at least twenty thousand wounded. And we have no stretchers or hammocks or assistant surgeons or medicines enough for even six thousand! We have ten thousand telyegas, but something else is necessary, certainly. We must do the best we can.” ....

The strange thought that out of all these thousands of living, healthy men, young and old, who looked at his white hat with such jovial curiosity, probably twenty thousand were doomed to suffer wounds and death (very possibly the very men whom he that moment saw), struck Pierre.

‘They, very possibly, will be dead men to-morrow;
why, then, can they be thinking of anything besides death?"

And, suddenly, by some mysterious association of ideas, he had a vivid recollection of the steep descent from Mozhaisk—the telyegas with the wounded, the chiming bells, the slanting rays of the sun, and the songs of the cavalymen.

"The cavalry are going into action, and they meet the wounded, and not for a single instant do they think of what is awaiting them, but they gallop by and greet the wounded; and out of all these men, twenty thousand are doomed to die, and yet they are interested in my hat! Strange!" thought Pierre, as he proceeded on his way to Tatarinovo.

At the mansion of a landed proprietor, on the left-hand side of the road, stood equipages, baggage wagons, a throng of denshchiks and sentinels. Here his serene highness was quartered, but when Pierre arrived he was out, and almost all of his staff. All were at a Te Deum service.

Pierre drove on farther, to Gorki. Mounting the hill, and passing beyond the narrow street of the village, Pierre saw for the first time the peasant militia, with crosses on their caps, and in white shirts, working with a will, with boisterous talk and laughter, at something, on a high, grass-grown mound to the right of the road.

Some of them had shovels, and were digging at the hill; others were transporting dirt in wheelbarrows, along planks; still others were standing about, doing nothing. Two officers were stationed on the mound, directing operations.

Pierre, seeing these muzhiks evidently enjoying the novelty of military service, again recalled the wounded soldiers at Mozhaisk, and he saw still deeper meaning in what the soldier had tried to express when he said they are trying to sweep in the whole nation. The sight of these bearded muzhiks working in the battle-field, in their clumsy boots, with their sweaty necks, and some with shirt-collars rolled back, exposing to sight their sunburned collar-bones, made a deeper impression on Pierre than all else that he had seen or heard hitherto concerning the solemnity and significance of the actual crisis.

CHAPTER XXI

Pierre left his equipage, and, passing by the laboring militia, he directed his steps to the mound, from which, as the doctor had told him, the whole battle-field was visible.

It was eleven o'clock in the morning. The sun stood a trifle to Pierre's left and rear, and sent its beams down through the pure, rarefied atmosphere, brilliantly lighting up the immense panorama of hill and vale that spread before him, as in an amphitheater.

Above, and to the left, cutting across this amphitheater, he could see the Smolensk highway, passing through a village with a white church situated five hundred paces distant from the mound and below it. This was Borodino. Near this village the road crossed the river by a bridge, and, winding and bending, mounted higher and higher, till it reached Valuyev, visible six versts away. (Here Napoleon now was.) Beyond Valuyev the road was lost to sight in a forest, which showed yellow against the horizon. In this forest of birches and firs, to the left from the highway, could be seen glistening in the sun the distant cross and belfry of the Kolotsky monastery. Over all this blue distance, to the left and to the right of the forest and the road, in various positions, could be seen the smoke of camp-fires, and indeterminate masses of the French and Russian troops.

At the right, looking down the rivers Kalotcha and Moskva, the country was full of ravines and hills. Among these hills, far away, could be seen the villages of Bezzubovo and Zakharino. At the left the country was more level; there were corn-fields, and the ruins of a village which had been set on fire, Semenovskoye, were still smoking.

All that Pierre saw on his right hand and his left was so confused that he found nothing that in any degree answered to his expectations. Nowhere could he find any such field of battle as he had counted on seeing, but only fields, clearings, troops, woodland, bivouac fires, villages, hills, brooks; and in spite of all his efforts he could not make out any definite position in this varied landscape, nor could he even distinguish our troops from the enemy's.

"I must ask of some one who knows," he said to himself, and he addressed himself to one of the officers, who was looking inquisitively at his huge, unmilitary figure.

"May I ask," said Pierre, turning to this officer, "what that village is yonder?"

"Burdino, isn't it?" replied the officer, referring to his comrade.

"Borodino," said the other, correcting him.

The officer, evidently pleased to have a chance to talk, approached Pierre.

"Are those ours yonder?" asked Pierre.

"Yes, and still farther are the French," said the officer. "There they are, there. Can you see?"

"Where? where?" asked Pierre.

"You can see them with the naked eye. See there."

The officer pointed at the columns of smoke rising at the left, on the farther side of the river, and his face assumed that stern and grave expression which Pierre had noticed on many faces which he had lately seen.

"Ah! is that the French? But who are yonder?"....

Pierre indicated a mound at the left, where troops were also visible.

"Those are ours."

"Oh, ours! But there?"....

Pierre pointed to another hill in the distance, where there was a tall tree near a village showing up in a valley, and with smoking bivouac fires and something black.

"That is he again," explained the officer (this was the Shevardino redoubt). "Yesterday it was ours, but now it's his."

"What is our position?"
“Our position,” repeated the officer, with a smile of satisfaction: “I can explain it to you clearly, because I arranged almost all our defenses. There, do you see? our center is at Borodino, over yonder.” He pointed to the village with the white church, directly in front. “There is where you cross the Kalotcha. Then here, do you see, down in that bottom-land, where the windrows of hay are lying?—there is a bridge there. That is our center. Our right flank is about yonder,”—he indicated a place far distant, between the hills at the extreme right,—“the river Moskva is there, and there we have thrown up three very strong earthworks. Our left flank....” here the officer hesitated. “You see, that is somewhat hard to explain to you. Yesterday our left flank was yonder at Shevardino; there, do you see, where that oak tree is? but now we have withdrawn the left wing, and now, — now do you see, yonder, that village and the smoke, that is Semenovskoye,—it is about there.” He pointed to the hill of Rayevsky. “But it's hard to tell if the action will come off there. He has brought his forces in that direction, but that's a ruse. He will probably try to outflank us from the side of the Moskva. Well, at all events, a good many of us will be counted out to-morrow,” said the officer.

An old non-commissioned officer, who had approached the speaker while he was talking, waited until his superior should finish, but at this juncture, evidently dissatisfied with what the officer was saying, interrupted him. “We must send for gabions,” said he, gravely.

The officer seemed to be abashed, as if realizing that, while it was permissible to think how many would be missing on the morrow, it was not proper to speak about it. “All right, send Company Three again,” said the officer, hurriedly. “And who are you? One of the doctors, are you?”

“No, I was merely looking.”

And Pierre again descended the hill, past the militiamen.

“Akh! curse 'em!” exclaimed the officer, following him and holding his nose as he ran by the laborers.
"There they are!" .... "They’ve got here, they’re coming!" .... "There they are!" .... "They’ll be here in a minute!" — such were the exclamations suddenly heard, and officers, soldiers, and the militiamen rushed down the road.

Up the long slope of the hill came a church procession from Borodino. At the forefront, along the dusty road, in fine order, came a company of infantry with their shakoes off, and trailing arms. Back of the infantry was heard a church chant.

Soldiers and militiamen, outstripping Pierre, ran ahead with their hats off to meet the coming procession.

"They are bringing our Matuskha! .... The Intercessor. The Iverskaya Virgin!"

"The Smolensk Matushka," said another, correcting the former speaker.

The militiamen, both those who belonged to the village and those who had been working at the battery, threw down their shovels and ran to meet the procession.

Behind the battalion which came marching along the dusty road walked the priests in their chasubles, — one little old man in a cowl, accompanied by the clergy and chanters. Behind them, soldiers and officers bore a huge ikon, with tarnished face, in its frame. This was the ikon which had been brought away from Smolensk, and had ever since followed the army. Behind it and around it and in front of it came hurrying throngs of soldiers, baring their heads and making obeisances to the very ground.

When the ikon reached the top of the hill it stopped. The men who had been lugging the holy image on carved staves were relieved, the diachoks again kindled their censers, and the Te Deum began. The sun poured his hot rays straight down from the zenith; a faint, fresh breeze played with the hair on the uncovered heads, and fluttered the ribbons with which the ikon was adorned; the chant sounded subdued under the vault of heaven.

An enormous throng of officers, soldiers, and milita-men, all with uncovered heads, surrounded the ikon. Back of the priest and diachok, on a space cleared and reserved, stood the officers of higher rank. One bald-headed general, with the George around his neck, stood directly back of the priest and did not cross himself,—he was evidently a German,—but waited patiently for the end of the Te Deum, which he considered it necessary to listen to, as being calculated to arouse the patriotism of the Russian nation.

Another general stood in a military position, and kept moving his hand in front of his chest and glancing around.

Pierre, who had taken his position amid a throng of muzhiks, recognized a number of acquaintances in this circle of officers; but he did not look at them; his whole attention was absorbed by the serious expression on the faces of the throng of soldiers and militia, with one consent gazing with rapt devotion at the wonder-working ikon.

When the weary sacristans—who had been performing the Te Deum for the twentieth time—began to sing "Save from their sorrows thy servants, Holy Mother of God!" and the priest and diachok, in antiphonal service, took up the strain, "Verily we all take refuge in Thee, as in a steadfast bulwark and defense," Pierre noticed that all faces wore that expression of consciousness of the solemnity of the moment, which he had marked at the foot of the hill near Mozhaisk, and by fits and snatches on many faces that had met him that morning. Heads were bent even more frequently, hair tossed up, and sighs and the sounds of crosses striking chests were heard.

The throng surrounding the ikon suddenly opened its ranks and jostled against Pierre.

Some one, evidently a very important personage, to judge by the eagerness with which they made way for him, approached the ikon.

It was Kutuzof, who had been out reconnoitering the position. On his way to Tatarinovo, he came to hear the Te Deum service. Pierre instantly recognized him by the peculiarity of his figure, which distinguished him from all the throng.

In a long overcoat, covering the huge bulk of his body, with a stoop in his back, with his white head bared, and with his hollow, white eye and puffy cheeks, Kutuzof advanced with his plunging, staggering gait, passed through the circle, and stood behind the priest. He crossed himself with a reverent gesture, touched his hand to the ground, and with a deep sigh bent his gray head. Behind Kutuzof were Benigsen and his suite. Notwithstanding the presence of the commander-in-chief, who attracted the attention of all those of higher rank, the militiamen and the soldiers, without looking at him, continued to offer their prayers.

When the service was concluded, Kutuzof went to the ikon, knelt down heavily, bowed to the ground; then he tried for some time to rise; his weight and feebleness made his efforts vain. His gray head shook from side to side in his exertion.

At last he got to his feet again, and, with a childishly naive thrusting-out of his lips, kissed the ikon, and again bent over and touched the ground with his hand. The generals present followed his example; then the officers, and then, crowding, pushing, jostling, and stepping on each other, with excited faces came the soldiers and militia.

CHAPTER XXII

Extricating himself from the crowd that pressed about him, Pierre looked around.

"Count, Piotr Kiriluiitch! How come you here?" cried some one's voice. Pierre looked round. Boris Drubetskoï, brushing the dust from his knee,—he had apparently, like the rest, been making his genuflections before the ikon,—came up to Pierre, smiling. Boris was elegantly attired, with just a shade of the wear and tear from having been on service. He wore a long frock coat and a whip over his shoulder in imitation of Kutuzof.
Kutuzof, meantime, had returned to the village, and sat down in the shadow cast by the adjoining house, on a bench brought out in all haste by a Cossack, while another had covered it with a rug. A large and brilliant suite gathered about him.

The icon had gone farther on its way, accompanied by a throng. Pierre, engaged in talking with Boris, remained standing about thirty paces from Kutuzof. He was explaining his intention of being present at the battle, and of reconnoitering the position.

"You do this way," said Boris. "I will do you the honors of the camp. The best thing is for you to see the whole affair from where Count Benigsen will be. You see, I am with him. I will propose it to him. And if you would like to ride round the position we will do it together; we are just going over to the left flank. And when we return I will beg you to do me the favor of spending the night with me, and we will get up a party. I think you are acquainted with Dmitri Sergeyevitch. He lodges over yonder."

He indicated the third house in Gorki.

"But I should like to see the right flank; they say it is very strong," protested Pierre. "I should like to ride over the whole position, from the Moskva River."

"Well, you can do that afterwards; but the main thing is the left flank."

"Yes, yes. But where is Prince Bolkonsky's regiment? Can't you show me?" demanded Pierre.

"Andrei Nikolayevitch's? We shall ride directly past it; I will take you to him."

"What were you going to say about the left flank?" asked Pierre.

"To tell you the truth, entre nous, God knows in what a condition our left flank is placed," said Boris, lowering his voice to a confidential tone. "Count Benigsen proposed something entirely different. He proposed to fortify that hill yonder; not at all this way.... but" — Boris shrugged his shoulders — "his serene highness would not hear to it, or he was overpersuaded. You see...."
But Boris did not finish what he was going to say, because just at that instant Kaïsarof, one of Kutuzof's aides, approached Pierre.

"Ah! Parsi Sergeyitch," exclaimed Boris, with a free and easy smile, addressing Kaïsarof. "Here I was just trying to explain our position to the count. It is a marvel to me how his serene highness could have succeeded so well in penetrating the designs of the French!"

"Were you speaking of the left flank?" asked Kaïsarof.

"Yes, yes, just that. Our left flank is now very, very strong."

Although Kutuzof had dismissed all superfluous members from his staff, Boris, after the changes that had been made, had managed in keeping his place at headquarters. He had procured a place with Count Benigsen. Count Benigsen, like all the other men under whom Boris had served, considered the young Prince Drubetskoï an invaluable man.

In the headquarters of the army were two sharply defined parties: that of Kutuzof and that of Benigsen, chief of staff. Boris belonged to the latter party; and no one was more skilful than he, even while expressing servile deference to Kutuzof, to insinuate that the old man was incapable, and that really everything was due to Benigsen.

They were now on the eve of a decisive engagement, which would be likely either to prove Kutuzof's ruin, and put the power in Benigsen's hands, or, even supposing Kutuzof were to win the battle, to make it seem probable that all the credit was due to Benigsen. In any case, great rewards would be distributed in the next few days, and new men would be brought to the fore. And, in consequence of this, Boris had been all that day in a state of feverish excitement.

Pierre was joined by other acquaintances, who came up after Kaïsarof, and he had no time to answer all the inquiries about Moscow with which they inundated him; and he had no time to listen to the stories which they told him. Excitement and anxiety were written in all faces. But it seemed to Pierre that the cause of these emotions, in some cases at least, was to be attributed rather to the possibility of personal success; and he found it impossible to help comparing them with that other expression of emotion which he had seen on other faces, and which was eloquent of something besides merely personal matters, but of the eternal questions of life and of death.

Kutuzof caught sight of Pierre's figure, and the group that had gathered round him.

"Bring him to me," said Kutuzof. An aide communicated his serene highness's message, and Pierre started to the place where he was sitting. But, before he got there, a private of militia approached Kutuzof.

It was Dolokhof.

"How comes this man here?" asked Pierre.

"He's such a beast! He's sneaking in everywhere!" was the answer. "He has been cashiered. Now he must climb up again. He has all sorts of schemes, and one night he crept up as far as the enemy's picket lines .... he's brave."

Pierre, taking off his hat, bowed respectfully to Kutuzof.

"I had an idea that if I made this report to your serene highness, you might order me off, or tell me that what I had to say was already known to you, and then all would be up with me...." Dolokhof was saying.

"Very true, very true!"

"But if I am correct, then I am doing a service for my country, for which I am ready to die."

"Very true .... very true!"....

"And if your serene highness needs a man who would not care if he came out with a whole skin or not, then please remember me .... maybe I might be of use to your serene highness."

"Very true .... very true!" .... said Kutuzof, for the third time, looking at Pierre with his one eye squinted up, and smiling.

At this instant, Boris, with his usual adroitness, came up in line with Pierre close to the chief, and, in the most natural manner in the world, said to Pierre, in his ordinary tone of voice, as if he were pursuing what he had already begun to say:

"The militia have put on clean white shirts, so as to be ready for death. What heroism, count!"

Boris said this to Pierre evidently for the sake of being overheard by his serene highness. He knew that Kutuzof would be attracted by these words, and, in fact, his serene highness turned to him.

"What did you say about the militia?" he asked of Boris.

"I said, your serene highness, that they had put on white shirts for to-morrow, as a preparation for death."

"Ah!.... They are a marvelous, incomparable people!" exclaimed Kutuzof, and, closing his eyes, he shook his head. "An incomparable people," he repeated, with a sigh. "So you wish to smell gunpowder?" he asked, addressing Pierre. "Well, it's a pleasant odor. I have the honor of being one of your wife's admirers; is she well? My quarters are at your service."

And, as often happens with old men, Kutuzof glanced about absent-mindedly, apparently forgetting all that he ought to say or to do. Then, apparently coming to a recollection of what his memory was searching for, he beckoned up Andrei Sergeyevitch Kaisarof, the brother of his aide:

"How.... how.... how do those verses.... those verses of Marin's.... how, how do they go? Something he wrote on Gerakof: 'Thou shalt be a teacher, in the corpus.' Repeat 'em, repeat 'em!" exclaimed Kutuzof, evidently in a mood to have a laugh.

Kaisarof repeated the poem. Kutuzof, smiling, nodded his head to the rhythm of the verses.

When Pierre left Kutuzof, Dolokhof approached and took him by the arm.

"Very glad to meet you here, count," said he, in a loud tone and with peculiar resolution and solemnity, not abashed by the presence of strangers. "On the eve of a day when God knows which of us may quit this life, I am glad of the opportunity to tell you that I am sorry for the misunderstandings which have existed between us, and that I hope you bear me no grudge. I beg you to pardon me.”

Pierre, smiling, gazed at Dolokhof, not knowing what answer to make. Dolokhof, with tears in his eyes, threw his arms around Pierre and kissed him.

Boris made some remark to his general, and Count Benigsen turned to Pierre and invited him to join him in a ride along the lines.

“It will be interesting to you,” said he.

“Yes, very interesting,” replied Pierre.

Half an hour later Kutuzof had gone back to Tatarnovo, and Benigsen with his suite, including Pierre, set off on their tour of inspection along the lines.

CHAPTER XXIII

Benigsen set forth from Gorki along the highway to the bridge to which Pierre’s attention had been called by the officer on the hilltop as being the center of the position, and where, along the intervale, the windrows of hay lay filling the air with perfume. They crossed the bridge into the village of Borodino, whence they turned to the left, and, passing a great quantity of troops and field-pieces, made their way to a high mound where the militia were constructing earthworks. This was the redoubt which as yet was not named, but was afterwards known as Rayevsky’s redoubt, or the Kurgannaya battery. Pierre did not pay any special attention to this redoubt. He did not know that this spot would come to be for him the most memorable of all the positions on the field of Borodino.

Then they rode down through the ravine to Semenovskoye, where the soldiers were dragging off the last remaining beams from the cottages and corn-kilns. Then down a hill and up a hill they rode, forward across a field of rye crushed down and beaten as if by a hail-storm, and over a road newly formed by the artillery through a plowed field until they reached the fleches which had just been started.

1 From kurgan, a mound or hill.

Benigsen drew up at the fleches and proceeded to scrutinize the Shevardino redoubt, — which had been ours the evening before, — where a number of horsemen could be distinguished.

The officers said that Napoleon or Murat was among them, and all gazed eagerly at the little knot of horsemen. Pierre also looked in the same direction, trying to make out which of these scarcely distinguishable men was Napoleon. At last the horsemen descended from the hill and disappeared.

Benigsen addressed a general who had approached him, and proceeded to explain the whole position of our troops. Pierre listened to Benigsen’s words, exerting all the powers of his mind to comprehend the nature of the approaching engagement, but he was mortified to discover that his intellectual powers were not capable of it. He got no idea whatever. Benigsen ceased speaking, and, noticing that Pierre was listening attentively, he said, suddenly addressing him: —

“I am afraid this does not interest you?”

“Oh, on the contrary, it is very interesting,” replied Pierre, not with absolute veracity.

From the fleches they took the road still farther toward the left; it wound through a dense but not lofty forest of birch trees. In the midst of these woods a cinnamon-colored hare with white legs bounded up before them, and, startled by the trampling of so many horses’ feet, was so bewildered that for some time it ran along the road in front of them, exciting general attention and amusement, and only when several of the men shouted at it did it dart to one side and disappear in the thicket.

Having ridden two versts through the wood, they came to the clearing where the troops of Tutchkof’s corps were stationed, whose duty it was to defend the left flank.

1 A kind of fortification. — Author’s Note.

Here, at the very extremity of the left flank, Benigsen had a wordy and heated conversation, and made what seemed to Pierre a very important disposition. In front of Tutchkof's division there was a slight rise of ground. This rise had not been occupied by our troops.

Benigsen vigorously criticized this blunder, declaring that it was a piece of idiocy to leave unoccupied a height commanding a locality, and to draw up the troops at the foot of it. Several of the generals expressed the same opinion. One in particular, with genuine military fervor, declared that the men were left there to certain destruction. Benigsen, on his own responsibility, commanded the troops to occupy this height.

This disposition on the left flank still further compelled Pierre to doubt his capacity to understand military manoeuvres. As he listened to Benigsen and the generals who were criticizing the position of the troops at the foot of the knoll, he perfectly understood them and agreed in their strictures; but for this very reason he found himself utterly unable to comprehend how the one who had placed the men there at the foot of the knoll could have made such a palpable and stupid blunder.

Pierre did not know that these troops had been stationed there, not to guard the position, as Benigsen supposed, but were set in ambuscade; in other words, in order to be hidden and to fall unexpectedly on the enemy as they approached. Benigsen did not know this, and he moved these troops forward by his own understanding of the case, and without first informing the commander-in-chief.
PRINCE ANDREÏ, that bright September afternoon of the sixth, was stretched out with his head leaning on his hand, in a dilapidated cow-shed, at the village of Kniazkovo, at the end of the position occupied by his regiment. Through a hole in the broken wall he was gazing at a row of thirty-year-old birches which ran along the edge of the inclosure, with their lower limbs trimmed off, and at a plowed field over which were scattered sheaves of oats, and at the coppice where the smoke of bivouac fires was rising, where the soldiers were cooking their suppers.

Narrow and useless and trying as Prince Andreï's life now seemed to him, he felt excited and irritable on the eve of the battle, just as he had seven years before at Austerlitz.

The orders for the morrow's battle were given and received by him. There was nothing further left for him to do. But his thoughts, the simplest, clearest, and therefore most terrible thoughts, refused to leave him to repose. He was aware that the morrow's engagement would be the most formidable of all in which he had ever taken part, and the possibility of death, for the first time in his life without reference to any worldly aspect, without consideration as to the effect it might produce upon others, but in its relation to himself, to his own soul, confronted him with vividness, almost with certainty, in all its grim reality.

And from the height of this consideration, all that which hitherto tormented and preoccupied him was suddenly thrown into a cold white light, without shadow, without perspective, without distinction of features.

All his life appeared to him as in a magic lantern, into which he had long been looking through a glass and by means of an artificial light.

Now he could suddenly see without a glass, by the clear light of day, these wretchedly painted pictures.

"Yes, yes, here are those false images which have excited and enraptured and deceived me," said he to himself, as he passed in review, in his imagination, the principal pictures of his magic-lantern life, now looking at them in this cold white light of day—the vivid thought of death.

"Here they are, these coarsely painted figures which pretended to represent something beautiful and mysterious. Glory, social advantages, woman's love, the country itself—how great seemed to me these pictures, what deep significance they seemed to possess. And all that seems now so simple, so cheap and tawdry, in the cold white light of that morning which, I am convinced, will dawn for me to-morrow."

The three chief sorrows of his life especially arrested his attention—his love for a woman, the death of his father, and the French invasion which was ingulfing half of Russia.

"Love!.... That young girl seemed to me endowed with mysterious powers. How was it? I loved her, I dreamed poetic dreams of love and happiness with her.... Oh, precious boy!" he cried aloud savagely. "How was it? I had faith in an ideal love which should keep her faithful to me during the whole year of my absence. Like the tender dove of the fable, she should have pined away while separated from me. But the reality was vastly more simple.... It was all horribly simple, disgusting!

"My father was building at Luisiya Gorui and supposing that it was his place, his land, his air, his peasants; but Napoleon came, and, not even knowing of his existence, swept him aside like a chip from the road, and his Luisiya Gorui was swallowed up and his life with it. But the Princess Mariya says that this is a discipline sent from above. For whom is it a discipline, since he is no more and will never be again? He will never be seen again. He is no more. Then to whom is it a discipline?

"The fatherland, the destruction of Moscow! But to-morrow I shall be killed—perhaps not even by the French, but by one of our own men, just as I might have been yesterday when the soldier discharged his musket near my head—and the French will come, will take me by the legs and shoulders and fling me into a pit, so that I may not become a stench in their nostrils, and new conditions of existence will spring up, to which other men will grow just as accustomed, and I shall not know about them, for I shall be no more!"

He gazed at the row of birches shining in the sun, with their motionless yellow, green, and white boles.

"I must die; suppose I am killed to-morrow, suppose it is the end of me,... the end of all, and I no longer existent!"

He vividly pictured the world, and himself not in it. The birches, with the lights and shades, and the curling clouds, and the smoke of the bivouac fires,—all suddenly underwent a change, and assumed for him something terrible and threatening. A cold chill ran down his back. Quickly leaping to his feet, he left the shed, and began to walk up and down.

Voices were heard behind the shed.

"Who is there?" asked Prince Andrei.

The red-nosed Captain Timokhin, who had formerly been Dolokhov's company commander, and now, owing to the lack of officers, had been promoted to battalion commander, came shyly to the shed. Behind him came an aide and the paymaster of the regiment.

Prince Andrei got up, listened to what the officers had to report to him, gave them a few extra directions, and was just about to dismiss them when he heard from behind the shed a familiar lisping voice.

"Que diable!" exclaimed the voice of this man, who tripped up over something.

Prince Andrei, peering out of the shed, saw advancing toward him his friend Pierre, who had just succeeded in stumbling and almost falling flat over a pole which was lying on the ground. As a general thing, it was disagreeable for Prince Andrei to see men from his own rank in life, and especially to see Pierre, who brought back to his remembrance all the trying moments which he had experienced during his last visit at Moscow.
“Ah! how is this?” he exclaimed. “What chance brings you here? I was not expecting you.”

While he was saying these words his eyes and his whole face expressed something more than mere coolness—it was rather an unfriendliness, which Pierre instantly remarked. He had approached the shed in the most animated frame of mind, but when he saw Prince Andrei's face he felt suddenly embarrassed and awkward.

“I came.... well.... you know.... I came.... it was interesting to me,” stammered Pierre, who had already used that word “interesting” no one knows how many times during the course of that day. “I wanted to see a battle.”

“So, so, but what do your brotherhood of Masons say about war? How can it be prevented?” asked Prince Andrei, ironically. “Well, how is Moscow? How are my family? Have they got to Moscow at last?” he asked gravely.

“Yes, they got there. Julie Drubetskaya told me. I went to call upon them, and failed to find them. They had gone to your pod-Moskovnaya.”

CHAPTER XXV

The officers were going to take their leave, but Prince Andrei, as apparently not wishing to be left alone with his friend, invited them to sit down and take tea. Stools and tea were brought. The officers, not without amazement, gazed at Pierre's enormously stout figure, and listened to his stories of Moscow, and the position of our troops which he had chanced to visit.

Prince Andrei said nothing, and the expression of his face was so disagreeable that Pierre addressed himself more to the good-natured battalion commander, Timokhin, than to Bolkonsky.

“So you understood all the arrangement of our forces, did you?” suddenly interrupted Prince Andrei.
"Yes—that is, to a certain extent," said Pierre; "so far as a civilian can. I don't mean absolutely, but still I understood the general arrangements."

"Then you are ahead of any one else!" said Prince Andrei.1

"Ha?" exclaimed Pierre, looking in perplexity over his glasses at Prince Andrei. "Well, what do you think about the appointment of Kutuzof?" he asked.

"I was very much pleased with it; that is all I can say about it," replied Prince Andrei.

"Now, then, please tell me your opinion in regard to Barclay de Tolly. They are saying all sorts of things about him in Moscow. What is your judgment about him?"

"Ask these gentlemen," suggested Prince Andrei, indicating the officers.

Pierre looked at Timokhin with that condescendingly questioning smile with which all treated him in spite of themselves.

"It brought light2 to us, your illustriousness, as soon as his serene highness took charge," said Timokhin, who kept glancing timidly at his regimental commander.

"How so?" asked Pierre.

"Well, now, take, for instance, firewood or fodder: I will explain it to you. We retreated from Swienciany, and did not dare to touch a dry branch or a bit o' hay or anything. You see, we marched off and left it for him. Wasn't that so, your illustriousness?" he asked, addressing "his prince." "It was, 'Don't you dare.' In our regiment, two officers were court-martialed for doing such things. Well, then, when his serene highness came in, it became perfectly simple as far as such things were concerned. We saw light." ....

"Then, why did he forbid it?"

Timokhin glanced around in some confusion, not knowing what to say in reply to this question. Pierre turned to Prince Andrei, and asked the same thing.

"In order not to spoil the country which we were

1 Eh bien, vous êtes plus avancé que qui cela soit.

2 Svyet, light; a play on the first syllable of svyetaelishii (most serene).
leaving to the enemy," replied Prince Andrei, with savage sarcasm. "It is very judicious never to allow the country to be pillaged and soldiers taught to be marauders. Well, then, at Smolensk, he also very correctly surmised that the French might outflank us since they outnumbered us. But one thing he could not understand," shouted Prince Andrei, in a high key, as if he had lost control of his voice. "He could not understand that we were for the first time fighting in defense of Russian soil, that the troops were animated by a spirit such as I, for one, had never seen before; that we had beaten the French two days running, and that this victory had multiplied our strength tenfold. He gave the orders to retreat, and all our efforts and losses were rendered useless. He never dreamed of playing the traitor; he tried to do everything in the best possible manner; his foresight was all-embracing,—but for that very reason he is good for nothing. He is good for nothing now, for the very reason that he lays out all his plans beforehand very judiciously and punctiliously, as it is natural for every German to do. How can I make it clear?.... See here! Your father has a German lackey, and he is an excellent lackey, and he serves him in all respects better than you could do, and so you let him do his work; but if your father is sick unto death, you send the lackey off, and with your own unaccustomed, unskilful hands, you look after your father, and you are more of a comfort to him than the skilful hand of a foreigner would be. And that is the case with Barclay. As long as Russia was well, a stranger could serve her and was an excellent servant; but as soon as she was in danger, she needs a man of her own blood. Well, you have accused him at the club of being a traitor. The only effect of traducing him as a traitor will be that afterwards, becoming ashamed of such a false accusation, the same men will suddenly make a hero or a genius of him, and that will be still more unjust. He is an honorable and very punctilious German."....

"At all events, they say he is a skilful commander," interposed Pierre.
"I don't know what is meant by a skilful commander," said Prince Andreï, with a sneer.

"A skilful commander," explained Pierre, "well, is one who foresees all contingencies.... reads his enemy's intentions."

"Well, that is impossible," said Prince Andreï, as if the matter had been long ago settled.

Pierre looked at him in amazement.

"Certainly," said he, "it has been said that war is like a game of chess."

"Yes," replied Prince Andreï; "only with this slight difference: that in chess you can think over each move as long as you wish, that you are in that case freed from conditions of time; and with this difference also, that the knight is always stronger than the pawn, and two pawns are always stronger than one, while in war a single battalion is sometimes stronger than a division, and sometimes weaker than a company. The relative strength of opposing armies can never be predicted. Believe me," said he, "if it depended on the dispositions made by the staff-officers, then I should have remained on the staff and made my dispositions; while as it is, instead, I have the honor of serving here in the regiment with these gentlemen, and I take it that, in reality, the affair of to-morrow will depend on us, and not on them.... Success never has depended, and never will depend, either on position or on armament or on numbers, and least of all on position."

"What does it depend on, then?"

"On the feeling that is in me and in him,"—he indicated Timokhin,—"and in every soldier."

Prince Andreï glanced at Timokhin, who was staring at his commander, startled and perplexed. Contrary to his ordinary silent self-restraint, Prince Andreï seemed now excited. Evidently he could not refrain from expressing the thoughts which had unexpectedly occurred to him.

"The battle will be gained by the one who is resolutely bent on gaining it. Why did we lose the battle of Austerlitz? Our loss was not much greater than that of the French, but we said to ourselves very early in the engagement that we should lose it, and we did lose it. And we said this because there was no reason for being in a battle there, and we were anxious to get away from the battle-field as soon as possible. 'We have lost, so let us run,' and we did run. If we had not said this till evening, God knows what would have happened. But to-morrow we shall not say that. You say our position, the left flank, is weak, the right flank too much extended,' he pursued, "but that is all nonsense. It is not so at all. For what is before us to-morrow? A hundred millions of the most various possibilities, which will be decided instantaneously by the fact that either they, or our men, will start to run; this one or that one will be killed. All that is being done now, though, is mere child's play. The fact is, those with whom you rode round inspecting the position, instead of promoting the general course of events, rather hinder it. They are occupied only with their own petty interests."

"At such a moment?" asked Pierre, reproachfully.

"Yes, even at such a moment," repeated Prince Andrei. "For them this is only a propitious time to oust a rival or win an extra cross or ribbon. I will tell you what I think to-morrow means. A hundred thousand Russian and a hundred thousand French soldiers meet in battle to-morrow, and the result will be that when these two hundred thousand soldiers have fought, the side will win that fights most desperately and is least sparing of itself. And, if you like, I will tell you this: Whatever happens, whatever disagreements there may be in the upper circles, we shall win the battle to-morrow. To-morrow, whatever happens, we shall win."

"You are right there, your illustriousness, perfectly right," echoed Timokhin. "Why should we spare ourselves now? The men in my battalion—would you believe it? —would not drink their vodka. 'It is not the time for it,' said they."

All were silent. The officers got up. Prince Andrei went with them behind the shed, giving his final directions to his aide.

When the officers had gone, Pierre joined Prince Andreï, and was just about to renew his conversation with him, when along the road that ran not far from the shed they heard the trampling hoofs of three horses, and, looking in that direction, Prince Andreï recognized Woltzogen and Kliazowitz, accompanied by a Cossack. They rode rapidly by, talking as they went, and Pierre and Andreï could not help hearing the following snatches of their conversation:—

"The war must spread into the country. I cannot sufficiently advocate this plan," said one.

"Oh, yes," replied the other, "our only object is to weaken the enemy, so of course we cannot consider the loss of private individuals." ¹

"O ja!" echoed the first again.

"Yes, 'spread into the country,'" repeated Prince Andreï, with an angry snort, after they had ridden past.

"'The country!' And there my father and son and my sister have had to bear the brunt of it at Luisiya Gorui. To him it is all the same. Now, that illustrates the very thing I was telling you. These German gentlemen will not win the battle to-morrow, but will only muddle matters as far as they can, for in their German heads there are only arguments which aren't worth a row of pins, while in their hearts they have nothing of what is alone useful at such a time—not one atom of what is in Timokhin. They have abandoned all Europe to him, and now they come here to teach us. Splendid teachers!" and again his voice became high and sharp.

"So you think that we shall win a victory to-morrow?" asked Pierre.

"Certainly I do," replied Prince Andreï, absently. "One thing I should have done if I could," he began, after a short pause; "I would have allowed no prisoners to be taken. What is the taking of prisoners? It is chivalry. The French have destroyed my home, and they are coming to destroy Moscow; they have insulted me, and they go on insulting me every second. They are my enemies, they are in my opinion criminals. And that expresses the feeling of Timokhin and the whole army. They must be punished. If they are my enemies, they cannot be my friends, whatever may have been said at Tilsit.”

¹ "Der Krieg muss im Raum verlegt werden. Der Ansicht kann ich genug Preis geben.—' O ja, der Zweck ist nur den Feind zu schwächen, so kann man gewiss nicht den Verlust der privad-Personen in Achtung nehmen."

“Yes, you are right,” assented Pierre, with gleaming eyes glancing at Prince Andreï. “I entirely agree with you.”

The question which had been troubling Pierre ever since his delay on the hillside of Mozhaïsk, and all that long day, now became to him perfectly clear and settled beyond a peradventure. He now comprehended all the meaning and significance of this war and of the impending battle. All that he had seen that day, all the stern faces full of thoughtfulness, of which he had caught a cursory glimpse, now were illuminated with a new light for him. He comprehended that latent heat of patriotism—to use a term of physics—which was hidden in all the men he had seen, and this explained to him why it was all these men were so calm, and, as it were, heedless in their readiness for death.

“Let no quarter be given,” pursued Prince Andreï. “That alone would change all war, and would really make it less cruel. But, as it is, we play at making war. That’s the wretchedness of it; we are magnanimous and all that sort of thing. This magnanimity and sensibility—it is like the magnanimity and sensibility of a high-born lady, who is offended if by chance she sees a calf killed; she is so good that she cannot see the blood, but she eats the same calf with good appetite when it is served with gravy. They prate to us about the laws of warfare, chivalry, flags of truce, humanity to the wounded, and the like. It’s all nonsense. I saw what chivalry, what our ‘parliamentarianism’ was in 1805; they duped us, we duped them. They pillage our homes, they issue counterfeit assignats, and worse than all, they kill our children and our fathers, and then talk about the laws of warfare and generosity to our enemies. Give no quarter, but kill and be killed! Whoever has reached this conclusion, as I have, by suffering...."

Prince Andrei, who had believed that it was a matter of indifference to him whether Moscow were taken or not taken,—just as Smolensk had been,—suddenly stopped short in the middle of his argument, owing to an unexpected cramp that took him in the throat. He walked up and down a few times in silence; but his eyes gleamed fiercely, and his lip trembled, when he again resumed the thread of his discourse.

"If there were none of this magnanimity in warfare, then we should only undertake it when, as now, it was a matter for which it was worth while to meet one's death. Then there would not be war because Pavel Ivanuitch had insulted Mikhail Ivanuitch. But if there must be war like the present one, let it be war. Then the zeal and intensity of the troop would always be like what it is now. Then all these Westphalians and Hessians, whom Napoleon has brought with him, would not have come against us to Russia, and we should never have gone to fight in Austria and Prussia without knowing why. War is not amiability, but it is the most hateful thing in the world, and it is necessary to understand it so and not to play at war. It is necessary to take this frightful necessity sternly and seriously. This is the pith of the matter; avoid falsehood, let war be war, and not sport. For otherwise war becomes a favorite pastime for idle and frivolous men. The military are the most honored of any class.

"But what is war, and what is necessary for its success, and what are the laws of military society? The end and aim of war is murder; the weapons of war are espionage, and treachery and the encouragement of treachery, the ruin of the inhabitants, and pillage and robbery of their possessions for the maintenance of the troops, deception and lies which pass under the name of finesse; the privileges of the military class are the lack of freedom, that is discipline, enforced inactivity, ignorance, rudeness, debauchery, drunkenness. And yet this is the highest caste in society, respected by all. All rulers, except the emperor of China, wear military uniforms, and the one who has killed the greatest number of men gets the greatest reward.

"Tens of thousands of men meet, just as they will to-morrow, to murder one another, they will massacre and maim; and afterwards thanksgiving Te Deums will be celebrated, because many men have been killed,—the number is always exaggerated,—and victory will be proclaimed on the supposition that the more men killed, the greater the credit. Think of God looking down and listening to them!" exclaimed Prince Andrei, in his sharp, piping voice. "Ah! my dear fellow,¹ of late life has been a hard burden. I see I have obtained too deep an insight into things. It is not for a man to taste of the knowledge of good and of evil—well, it is not for long, now," he added. "However, it is your bedtime; and it is time for me to turn in too. —Go back to Gorki!" suddenly exclaimed Prince Andrei.

"Oh, no," cried Pierre, looking at Prince Andrei with frightened, sympathetic eyes.

"Go, go; before an engagement one must get some sleep," insisted Prince Andrei. He came swiftly up to Pierre, threw his arms around him, and kissed him. "Farewell,—prashchaɪ; go now," he cried. "We may not meet again—no" — and, hurriedly turning his back on his friend, he went into the shed.

It was already dark, and Pierre could not make out the expression of Prince Andrei's face, whether it was angry or tender.

Pierre stood for some time in silence, deliberating whether to follow him or to go to his lodgings.

"No, he does not want me," Pierre decided, "and I know that this is our last meeting."

He drew a deep sigh, and went back to Gorki.

Prince Andrei, retiring into his shed, threw himself down on a rug, but he could not sleep.

¹ Akh, dusha moya.
He closed his eyes. One picture after another rose before him. One in particular held him long in rapt, joyous attention. He had a vivid remembrance of an evening at Petersburg. Natasha, with her eager, vivacious face, was telling him how, the summer before, while she was out after mushrooms, she had lost her way in the great forest. She gave him a disconnected description of the darkness of the woods, and her sensations, and her conversation with a bee-hunter whom she had met; and every little while she had interrupted her story and said: "No, I can't tell you, you won't understand," although Prince Andrei had tried to calm her by assuring her that he understood; and in reality he had understood all that she wanted to say.

Natasha had been dissatisfied with her own words; she felt that she could not express the passionately poetical sensation which she had felt that day, and which she desired to express in words.

"The old man was so charming, and it was so dark in the forest .... and he had such good .... but, O dear, I can't tell you," she had said, blushing and becoming agitated.

Prince Andrei smiled even now the same joyous smile which he had smiled then as he looked into her eyes.

"I understood her," said he to himself; "not only did I understand her, but I loved that moral power of hers, that frankness, that perfect honesty of soul,—yes, her soul itself, which seemed to dominate her body, —her soul itself I loved — so powerfully, so happily I loved...."

And suddenly he recalled what it was that had put an end to his love.

"He needed nothing of the sort. He saw nothing, understood nothing, of all this. All he saw was a very pretty and fresh young girl, with whom he did not even think it worth his while to join his fate. But I?.... and he is still alive and enjoying life!"

Prince Andrei, as if something had scalded him, sprang up and once more began to pace up and down in front of the shed.
CHAPTER XXVI

On the sixth of September, the day before the battle of Borodino, M. de Beausset, grand chamberlain to the emperor of the French, and Colonel Fabvier arrived, the first from Paris, the other from Madrid, with dispatches to the Emperor Napoléon at his camp at Valuyeko.

After M. de Beausset had put on his court uniform, he ordered a packet which he had brought to the emperor to be taken in, and he entered the outer division of Napoleon's tent, where, while talking with Napoleon's aides-de-camp who crowded round him, he busied himself with undoing the wrapper of the case.

Fabvier, not entering the tent, paused at the entrance, and entered into conversation with generals of his acquaintance.

The Emperor Napoleon had not yet left his bedroom, where he was engaged in making his toilet. Sniffing and grunting, he was turning first his stout back, then his fat chest, to the valet who was plying the brush. A second valet, holding his fingers over the bottle, was sprinkling the emperor's neatly arrayed person with eau de cologne, his expression intimating that he was the only one who knew how much cologne to use, and where it should be applied. Napoleon's short hair was wet and pasted down on his forehead. But his face, though puffy and sallow, expressed physical satisfaction. "Allez ferme.... allez toujours — brush harder .... put more energy in," he was saying to the valet, as he shrugged his shoulders and grunted.

One of his aides-de-camp, who had been admitted into his sleeping-room to submit a report to the emperor as to the number of prisoners taken during the engagement of the preceding day, having accomplished his errand, was standing by the door, awaiting permission to retire. Napoleon scowled and glared at the aide from under his brows.

"No prisoners," said he, repeating the aide-de-camp's words. "They compel us to annihilate them. So much the worse for the Russian army. — Go on, more energy!" he exclaimed, hunching up his back, and offering his plump shoulders. "That'll do. Show in M. de Beausset, and Fabvier as well."

"Yes, sire," and the aide-de-camp disappeared through the door of the tent.

The two valets de chambre quickly dressed his majesty, and he, in the blue uniform of the Guards, with firm, swift steps, entered the anteroom. Beausset was at that instant engaged in placing the gift which he had brought from the empress on two chairs directly in front of the entrance. But the emperor had dressed and come out with such unexpected promptness that he had not time to get the surprise arranged to his satisfaction.

Napoleon instantly remarked what he was doing, and conjectured that they were not quite ready for him. He did not want to spoil their pleasure in surprising him. He pretended not to see M. Beausset, and addressed himself to Fabvier.

Napoleon, with a deep frown, and without speaking, listened to what Fabvier said about the bravery and devotion of his troops who had been fighting at Salamanca, at the other end of Europe, and who had only one thought — to be worthy of their emperor; and one fear — that of not satisfying him.

The result of the engagement had been disastrous. Napoleon, during Fabvier's report, made ironical observations, giving to understand that the affair could not have resulted differently, he being absent.

"I must regulate this in Moscow," said Napoleon. "À tantôt — Good-by for now," he added, and approached De Beausset, who by this time had succeeded in getting his surprise ready — some object covered with a cloth having been placed on the chairs.

De Beausset bowed low with that courtly French bow which only the old servants of the Bourbons could even pretend to execute, and, advancing, he handed Napoleon an envelop.
Napoleon approached him and playfully took him by the ear.

“You have made good time; I am very glad. Well, what have they to say in Paris?” he asked, suddenly changing his former stern expression into one of the most genial character.

“Sire, all Paris regrets your absence,” replied De Beausset, as in duty bound.

But though Napoleon knew that De Beausset was bound to say this, or something to the same effect, though in his lucid intervals he knew that this was not true, it was agreeable to him to hear this from De Beausset. He again did him the honor of taking him by the ear.

“I am sorry to have caused you to take such a long journey,” said he.

“Sire, I expected nothing less than to find you at the gates of Moscow,” said Beausset.

Napoleon smiled, and, heedlessly raising his head, he glanced to the right.

An aide-de-camp with a gliding gait approached with a gold snuff-box, and presented it. Napoleon took it.

“Yes, it has turned out luckily for you,” he said, putting the open snuff-box to his nose. “You enjoy traveling; in three days you will see Moscow. You really could not have expected to see the Asiatic capital. You will have had a pleasant journey.”

Beausset made a low bow to express his gratitude for this discovery of his proclivity for traveling, till now unknown to him.

“Ah, what is that?” exclaimed Napoleon, noticing that all the courtiers were glancing at the something hidden by a covering.

Beausset, with courtier-like dexterity, not turning his back on his sovereign, took two steps around and at the same time snatched off the covering, saying:

“A gift to your majesty, from the empress.”

This was Gérard’s brilliantly painted portrait of the little lad born to Napoleon and the Austrian emperor’s daughter—the child whom all, for some reason, called the king of Rome.

The perfectly rosy, curly-haired boy, with a face like the face of the child in the Sistine Madonna, was represented playing bilboquet. The ball represented the earth, and the cup in his other hand represented a scepter. Although it was not perfectly clear why the artist wished to represent the so-called king of Rome transfixed the earth-ball with a stick, still this allegory seemed perfectly clear to all who saw the picture in Paris, as well as to Napoleon, and greatly delighted them.

"Roi de Rome!" he exclaimed, with a graceful gesture pointing to the portrait. "Admirable." With that facility characteristic of Italians, of changing at will the expression of his countenance, he approached the portrait and assumed a look of thoughtful tenderness.

He was conscious that what he was saying and doing at that moment was history. And it seemed to him that the best thing he could do now was to display the simplest paternal affection, as being most of a contrast to that majesty the consequence of which was that his son played bilboquet with the earth for a ball.

His eyes grew dim; he drew near it, he looked round for a chair—the chair sprang forward and placed itself under him—and he sat down in front of the portrait. He waved his hand, and all retired on their tiptoes, leaving the great man to himself and his feelings.

After sitting there for some time and letting his attention, he knew not why, be attracted by the roughness with which the picture was painted, he got up and again beckoned to Beausset and the aide on duty.

He gave orders to have the portrait carried out in front of his tent, so that his Old Guard, who were stationed around his tent, might not be deprived of the bliss of seeing the king of Rome, the son and heir of their beloved monarch. As he anticipated, while he was eating breakfast with Beausset, on whom he conferred this honor, he heard the enthusiastic shouts of the officers and soldiers of the Old Guard, who came to view the portrait.
"Vive l'Empereur! Vive le Roi de Rome! Vive l'Empereur," shouted the enthusiastic voices.

After breakfast, Napoleon, in Beausset's presence, dictated his address to the army.

"Courte et énergique!—short and to the point!" exclaimed Napoleon, as he read it aloud, the proclamation which had been written down word for word without a change. The proclamation said:

"Soldiers! the battle which you have so eagerly desired is at hand. Victory depends on you, but victory is indispensable for us; it will give you all that you need, comfortable quarters, and a speedy return to your native land. Behave as you behaved at Austerlitz, Friedland, Vitebsk, and Smolensk. Let your remotest posterity recall with pride your exploits on this day. And it will be said of each one of you, 'He was present at the great battle on the Moskova.'"

"De la Moskowa," repeated Napoleon, and, taking M. de Beausset with him, who was so fond of traveling, he left the tent and mounted his horse, which was waiting already saddled.

"Votre majesté a trop de bonté!—Your majesty is too kind," said Beausset, in reply to the emperor's invitation to accompany him on his ride; he would have preferred to go to sleep, and he did not like, nay, he even feared, to ride on horseback.

But Napoleon nodded his head to the traveler, and Beausset had to go.

When Napoleon left the tent, the acclamations of his guards in front of his son's portrait were more eager than ever. Napoleon frowned.

"Take it away," said he, pointing to the portrait with a graceful and imperious gesture. "He is too young yet to see a battle."

Beausset, closing his eyes and bending his head, drew a deep sigh, signifying thereby how able he was to appreciate and prize his emperor's words.
CHAPTER XXVII

Napoleon, according to his historians, passed the entire day of September 6 on horseback, inspecting the battle-field, examining the plans suggested by his marshals, and personally giving orders to his generals.

The original position of the Russian army along the Kalotcha had been broken, and the capture of the Shevardino redoubt on the fifth had forced a part of this line, particularly the left flank, to retreat. This part of the line had not been fortified, nor was it protected any longer by the river, and before it extended a more open and level ground.

It was evident to any one, whether soldier or civilian, that this part of the line was where the French would surely make their attack. To reach this conclusion it would seem that there was no need of many combinations, no need of such sedulous and solicitous preparations on the part of the emperor and his marshals, and certainly no need of that high and extraordinary capacity called genius, which men so like to attribute to Napoleon. But the historians who have most recently described these events, and the men who at that time surrounded Napoleon, and Napoleon himself, thought otherwise.

Napoleon rode over the ground, profoundly absorbed in thought, inspected the battle-field, moved his head in silent approval or disapproval; and, without deigning to reveal to the generals about him the profound ideas that influenced his decisions, he gave them only definite deductions in the form of orders.

Davoust, called the Duke of Eckmühl, having proposed to turn the left flank of the Russians, Napoleon declared that it was unnecessary to do this, but he did not explain why it was unnecessary to do this.

To the proposition of General Campan (who was to attack the fleches) to lead his division through the woods, Napoleon gave his consent; the so-called Duke of Elchingen (that is, Ney) permitted himself to observe that the march through the woods would be dangerous, and might throw the division into disorder.

Napoleon, having inspected the ground over against the Shevardino redoubt, remained for some time in silent meditation; then he pointed out the positions where two batteries were to be placed for the bombardment of the Russian fortifications on the next day, and he selected positions on the same line for the field artillery.

Having given these and other orders, he retired to his tent, and at his dictation the plan of battle was committed to writing.

This plan, of which French historians speak with enthusiasm, and which the historians of other nations treat with deep respect, was as follows:—

At daybreak the two new batteries established during the night on the plateau by the Prince of Eckmühl will open fire on the two opposing batteries of the enemy.

At the same moment, General Pernety, commanding the First Corps of artillery, with thirty cannon from Campan’s division, and all the howitzers of Dessaix’s and Friant’s divisions, will advance and begin shelling the enemy’s battery, which will thus have opposed to it,—

24 pieces of the artillery of the Guard,
30 pieces from Campan’s division, and
8 pieces from Friant’s and Dessaix’s divisions.

Total: 62 cannon.

General Fouché, commanding the Third Corps of artillery, will place himself with all the howitzers of the Third and Eighth Corps, sixteen in number, on the flanks of the battery attacking the left redoubt, giving this battery an effective of 40 pieces.

General Sorbier will stand ready, at the first word of command, with all the howitzers of the Guard, to bring to bear against one or the other redoubt.

During the cannonade, Prince Poniatowski will move against the village in the woods, and turn the position of the enemy.

General Campan will move along the edge of the woods to carry the first redoubt.

The battle thus begun, orders will be given according to the enemy’s movements.
The cannonade on the left flank will begin at the moment when that on the right is heard. A heavy infantry fire will be opened by Morand's division, and by the divisions of the viceroy, as soon as they see that the attack on the right has begun.

The viceroy will take possession of the village, and debouch by its three bridges upon the heights, while Generals Morand and Gérard will deploy under command of the viceroy to seize the enemy's redoubt and form the line of battle with the other troops.

All this must be done with order and method (le tout se fera avec ordre et méthode), taking care to hold the troops in reserve as far as possible.

At the imperial camp, near Mozhaïsk, September 6, 1812.

This order — very far from clear in style, and confusing to any one who is so sufficiently lacking in religious awe for the genius of Napoleon as to dare analyze its meaning — contains four points, four commands. Not one of these commands could have been executed; not one of them was executed.

In the order of battle the first command read as follows:—

The batteries established at the points selected by Napoleon, with the cannon of Pernety and Fouché, will place themselves in line, one hundred and two pieces in all, and, opening fire, will storm the Russian outworks and redoubts with shot and shell.

This could not be done, because from the place selected by Napoleon the missiles did not reach the Russian works, and these one hundred and two cannon thundered in vain until the nearest commander ordered them forward, contrary to Napoleon's decree.

The second command was to this effect:—

Poniatowski will move against the village in the woods, and turn the left wing of the Russians.

This could not be done and was not done, because Poniatowski, on moving toward the village in the woods,

1 Borodino.
found Tutchkof there blocking the way, and he could not and did not turn the position of the Russians.

The third command:

General Campan will move along the edge of the woods to carry the first redoubt.

Campan's division did not carry the first redoubt, but it was repulsed, because, on emerging from the woods, it was obliged to close up under the Russian grape-shot, something which Napoleon had not foreseen.

Fourth:

The viceroy will take possession of the village [Borodino], and debouch by its three bridges upon the heights, while Generals Morand and Gérard [who are told neither where nor when to go] will deploy under command of the viceroy to seize the enemy's redoubt and form the line of battle with the other troops.

As far as it is possible to understand this (not from the vague phraseology employed, but from the viceroy's attempt to carry out the orders he received), it seems he was to move through Borodino from the left against the redoubt, and that Morand and Gérard's divisions were at the same time to advance from the front.

This command, like all the rest, was not carried out, because it was impracticable.

When he had got beyond Borodino, the viceroy was forced back upon the Kalotcha, and found it impossible to advance. Morand and Friant's divisions did not take any redoubts, but were repulsed, and the redoubt was carried by the cavalry at the close of the battle, a contingency which Napoleon apparently had not foreseen.

Thus not one of the commands in this order was performed or could have been.

The order further announced that "during the battle thus begun" instructions would be given in accordance with the enemy's movements, and therefore we might infer that Napoleon, during the battle, made all the suggestions that were necessary. He did, and could have done, nothing of the sort, because throughout the engagement Napoleon happened to be so far away from the field of action that (as it transpired afterwards) the progress of the battle could not even have been known to him, and not one of his orders during the time of the engagement could be carried out.

CHAPTER XXVIII

Many historians assert that the battle of Borodino was not won by the French because Napoleon had a cold in the head, that if it had not been for this cold, his arrangements before and during the battle would have displayed still more genius, and Russia would have been conquered, and the face of the world would have been changed.

For the historians that believe Russia was formed at the will of one man, Peter the Great, and that France was changed from a republic to an empire and that the French armies invaded Russia at the will of one man, Napoleon, the argument that Russia retained power after the battle of Borodino because Napoleon had a bad cold in his head on September 7 is logically consistent.

If it had depended on Napoleon's will to fight or not to fight the battle of Borodino, on his will to make or not to make such and such dispositions of his forces, then evidently the cold in his head, which had such influence on the manifestation of his will, may have been the cause of the salvation of Russia; and the valet who, on September 5, forgot to provide Napoleon with waterproof boots, was the savior of Russia.

When we have once started on this line of reasoning, this conclusion is inevitable; just as inevitable as that reached by Voltaire when in jest—himself not knowing what he was driving at—he demonstrated that the Massacre of Saint Bartholomew was due to the fact that Charles IX. suffered from a fit of indigestion.

But for men who do not admit that Russia was formed at the will of one man, Peter I., and that the French empire arose or that the campaign in Russia was undertaken at the bidding of a single man, Napoleon, such reasoning will appear to be not only false, but contrary to all human experience. To the question, What is the cause of historical events? a very different answer presents itself, and one that implies that the progress of events on earth is preordained; that it depends on the combined volition of all who participate in these events, and that the influence of Napoleons on the progress of these events is superficial and fictitious.

How strange seems at first glance the proposition that the Massacre of Saint Bartholomew, the order for which was given by Charles IX., did not come from his own volition, but that it merely seemed to him that he had ordered it to be done; or that the battle of Borodino, which cost the lives of eighty thousand men, was not fought through Napoleon’s volition, though he gave the orders for the beginning and course of the engagement, but that it merely seemed to him that he had ordered it — how strange seems this proposition; but the dignity of humanity, which tells me that each of us, if he be not more of a man, is at least not less than every Napoleon, directs me to this solution of the problem, and it is powerfully justified by historical facts.

At the battle of Borodino, Napoleon shot no one and killed no one. All that was done by his soldiers. Of course he killed no one.

The soldiers of the French army went into the battle of Borodino to kill Russian soldiers, not in consequence of Napoleon’s orders, but by their own desires. The whole army, French, Italians, Germans, Polyaks, famished and in rags, worn out by the campaign, felt, at sight of the Russian army barring the road to Moscow, that the wine was uncorked, and they had only to drink; — que le vin est tiré et qu’il faut le boire. If at that moment Napoleon had forbidden them to fight the Russians, they would have killed him and fought with the Russians; for this was inevitable for them.

When they heard Napoleon’s proclamation, which offered them, in exchange for mutilation and death, the consoling testimony of posterity that they had been in the battle at Moscow, they cried, "Vive l'Empereur!" —just as they cried "Vive l'Empereur!” at seeing the picture of the child piercing the terrestrial globe with the bilboquet stick; and just as they would have shouted
"Vive l'Empereur!" to any nonsense spoken to them.
There was nothing more for them to do than to cry
"Vive l'Empereur!” and go into battle in order to reach food and the repose of victors at Moscow. Of course it was not at Napoleon's order that they killed their fellow-men.
And Napoleon did not direct the progress of the battle, for no part of his plan was carried out; and during the engagement he did not know what was going on before him.
Of course, how these men killed one another had nothing to do with Napoleon, but was independent of his will; it was determined by the will of the hundreds of thousands of men who took part in the combat. It only seemed to Napoleon that it proceeded by his will.
Thus the question, "Did or did not Napoleon have a cold in his head?" is of no more importance to history than the question whether the most insignificant train-hand had a cold in the head.
The fact that Napoleon was afflicted with a cold in the head on September 7 is still more insignificant because the assertions made by writers that this cold in the head caused Napoleon’s dispositions and orders at the time of the battle to be less skilful than those in times past are perfectly false.
The plan here described was not at all inferior — it was even superior — to all the plans by which his previous battles had been won. The imaginary combinations during this battle were not in the least inferior to those of previous battles; they were just the same as always.
But these dispositions and combinations seem less fortunate because the battle of Borodino was the first battle that Napoleon did not win. The best plans and the most sagacious dispositions and combinations in the world seem very poor, and every scientific soldier does not hesitate to criticize them with solemn face, when they do not end in victory! And the feeblest dispositions and combinations seem very excellent, and learned men devote entire volumes to the demonstration of the superiority of wretched plans, when they are crowned with success.

The plan proposed by Weirother for the battle of Austerlitz was a model of its kind, but it was nevertheless condemned for its very perfection, for its superabundance of details.

Napoleon at the battle of Borodino played his part as representative of power as well as in other battles—even better. He did nothing that could hinder the successful course of the battle: he accepted the most reasonable advice, he did not confuse his orders, he did not contradict himself, he did not lose heart, he did not abandon the field of battle, but with all his tact and his great experience in war he played with calmness and dignity the part of a seeming commander.

CHAPTER XXIX

On returning from his second solicitous tour of inspection along the line, Napoleon said:—

"The chessmen are set; the game will begin to-morrow."

Calling for a glass of punch, and summoning Beausset, he began to talk with him about Paris, and discuss various alterations which he proposed to make in the empress's household—la maison de l'Impératrice,—causing wonder at the attention which he gave to the minutest details of court management.

He displayed great interest in trifles, he jested at Beausset's fondness for travel, and with perfect coolness he chatted just as a famous and self-confident surgeon, who knew his business, might do, even while he rolls up his cuffs and puts on his apron and the patient is fastened to the operating table.
"The whole thing is in my hands and in my head, clearly and definitely. When the time comes to act, I will do my work, as no one else could, but now I can jest; and the more I jest and appear calm and collected, the more should you be confident, trustful, and amazed at my genius."

After drinking a second glass of punch, Napoleon went to rest before the serious affair which, as it seemed to him, was waiting for him on the morrow.

He was so much interested in this affair that was before him, that he could not sleep, and, in spite of his cold, which had been increased by the evening dampness, he got up about three o'clock in the morning, and, loudly blowing his nose, passed into the outer division of his tent. He asked if the Russians had not retreated. He was told that the enemy's fires were still burning in the same places. He nodded his head approvingly. The aide-de-camp on duty entered the tent.

"Well, Rapp, do you think we shall have good luck to-day?" he asked.

"Certainly, your majesty," replied Rapp. Napoleon gave him an attentive look. "You remember, your majesty, that you did me the honor of remarking at Smolensk,—'The wine is uncorked; we have only to drink it.'"

Napoleon frowned, and sat for some time in silence, resting his head on his hands.

"This poor army," he exclaimed suddenly, "has been seriously diminishing since we left Smolensk. Fortune is a fickle jade, Rapp, une franche courtisane; I always said so, and I am beginning to experience it. But the Guard, Rapp, the Guard is undiminished?" he said, with a questioning inflection.

"Yes, sire," replied Rapp.

Napoleon took a lozenge, put it in his mouth, and glanced at his watch. He felt no inclination to sleep, though it was still long before morning; but it was impossible to issue any more orders for the sake of killing time, for they had all been made, and were even then being executed.
“Have the biscuits and rice been distributed among the regiments of the Guard?” asked Napoleon, sternly.

“Oui, sire.”

“But the rice?”

Rapp replied that he had issued the emperor's orders in regard to the rice, but Napoleon shook his head angrily, as if he had no confidence in his orders having been fulfilled. A servant came in with the punch. Napoleon commanded another glass to be given to Rapp, and silently sipped from his own.

“I have no taste or smell,” said he, sniffing at the glass. “This influenza is a nuisance. They talk about medicine. What does medicine amount to when they can't even cure a cold! Corvisart gave me these lozenges, but they don't help me any. What can they cure? What can physic do? Nothing at all! Our body is a living-machine—une machine à vivre. It is organized for that purpose, that is its nature; let the life in it be left to itself; let it defend itself; it will do more than if you paralyze it by loading it down with remedies. Our body is like a perfect watch which is meant to go a certain time; the watchmaker cannot open it; he can only regulate it by his sense of feeling and with his eyes shut. Our body is a living-machine, that is all it is.”

And Napoleon, having as it were started on the path of definitions, of which he was very fond, suddenly and unexpectedly made still a new one.

“Rapp, do you know what the art of war is?” he asked. “It is the art of being stronger than the enemy at a given moment—that is all.”

Rapp made no reply.

“To-morrow we shall have Kutuzof to deal with,” said Napoleon. “We shall see. You remember he commanded the armies at Braunau, and not once during three weeks did he mount a horse to inspect the fortifications. We shall see!”

He glanced at his watch. It was only four o'clock. He still had no desire to sleep; the punch was drunk up, and as yet there was nothing to do. He got up, began to pace up and down; then he put on his thick overcoat and hat and went outside the tent. The night was dark and damp; one could almost hear the moisture falling. The bivouac fires, even those near at hand, burned far from brightly, and those in the distance, in the Russian lines, gleamed dimly in the fog. Through the silence clearly could be heard the bustle and trampling of the French troops, already beginning to move to their designated positions.

Napoleon walked out in front of his tent, gazed at the fires, listened to the growing tumult, and, as he passed by a tall grenadier in a wet hat, who was on duty as sentinel by his tent, and who stood stiff and straight like a pillar when the emperor appeared, Napoleon paused.

"How long have you been in the service?" he asked, with his ordinary affectation of hearty and affectionate military bluntness, which he always employed when dealing with his soldiers. The soldier answered him.

"Ah, a veteran! Has your regiment received the rice?"

"We have, your majesty."

Napoleon nodded and left him.

At half-past five, Napoleon mounted and rode to the village of Shevardino.

It was beginning to grow light; the sky was clearing; only a single cloud lay against the east. The deserted bivouac fires were dying out in the pale light of the morning.

At the right thundered a single heavy cannon-shot, prolonged by the echoes, and finally dying away amid the general silence.

There was an interval of several minutes. A second shot, then a third, rolled out, shaking the air; a fourth, a fifth, answered near at hand, and solemnly, somewhere at the right.

The echoes of the first cannon-shots had not died away when still others joined in, then more and more, mingling and blending in one continuous roar.

Napoleon galloped with his suite to the Shevardino redoubt and there dismounted.

The game had begun.
CHAPTER XXX

Having returned to Gorki from his visit to Prince Andrei, Pierre gave his orders to his equerry to have his horses ready, and to waken him early in the morning, and then immediately went to sleep behind the screen in the corner which Boris had kindly offered him.

When Pierre was fairly awake the next morning there was not a soul in the cottage. The window-panes in the little windows were rattling. His equerry was standing by him, shaking him.

"Your illustriousness, your illustriousness, your illustriousness!" exclaimed the equerry, stubbornly shaking him by the shoulder, and apparently hopeless of being able to wake him.

"Be good enough to listen to the firing," said the equerry, who had once been a soldier. "The gentlemen have all gone. His serene highness went long ago."

Pierre hurriedly dressed and went out on the steps. Outside it was bright, cool, dewy, and cheerful. The sun was just making its way out from under the cloud which had obscured it momentarily, and poured its rays through the breaking clouds, across the roofs of the opposite houses, over the dusty road covered with dew, on the walls of the houses, on the windows of the cathedral, and on Pierre's horses standing near the cottage. Out of doors the rolling of the cannon was heard more distinctly. An aide, followed by his Cossack, was galloping down the street.

"It is time, count, time," cried the aide.

Ordering the man to follow him with his horse, Pierre walked along the road to the mound from the top of which, the day before, he had surveyed the field of battle. Here were collected a throng of military men, and he could hear the members of the staff talking French, and he could see Kutuzof's gray head covered with a white hat with red band, and the gray nape of his neck sunk between his shoulders. He was gazing through his field-glass to the front along the highway.

As Pierre mounted the steps that led to the top of the mound, he looked out over the prospect, and was overwhelmed at the beauty of the spectacle.

It was the same panorama he had surveyed the day before from the same elevation; but now all those localities were covered with troops and the smoke of the cannon; and the slanting rays of the bright sun, rising behind Pierre at the left, fell upon it through the clear morning atmosphere in floods of light, shot with golden and rosy tones and intermingled with long, dark shadows.

The distant forests which bounded the panorama, just as if they were hewn out of some precious yellow-green gem, could be traced by the curving line of the tree-tops against the horizon, and between them, beyond Valuyevo, the Smolensk highway, now all covered with troops, cut sharply.

Still nearer gleamed the golden fields and groves. Everywhere, in front and behind, at the right hand and at the left, troops were swarming. The whole scene was animated, majestic, and marvelous; but what surprised Pierre more than all was the spectacle of the battle-field itself, Borodino, and the valley through which the Kalotcha River ran.

Over the Kalotcha at Borodino, and on both sides of the river, more noticeably on the left bank, where, through marshy intervales, the Voïna falls into the Kalotcha, was that mist which so mysteriously veils, spreads, and grows transparent as the bright sun mounts, and magically colors and transforms everything that is seen through it.

The smoke of the cannon was blending with this mist, and over this blended mist and smoke, everywhere, gleamed the lightning flashes of the morning brilliancy, here over the water, there on dewy meadows, there on the bayonets of the infantry swarming along the banks and in the village.

Through this mist could be seen a white church, a few roofs of Borodino cottages, here and there compact masses of soldiers, here and there green caissons, cannons. And this scene was in motion, or seemed to be in motion, because this mist and smoke was stretched over the whole space. On these lowlands around Borodino, covered with mist, so also above, and especially at the left, over the whole line, over the woods, over the fields, in the hollows, on the summits of the rising ground, constantly born, self-evolved from nothing, rose the puffs of cannon-smoke; now singly, now in groups; now scattered, now clustered; and as they formed, and grew, and coalesced, and melted together, they seemed to cover the whole space.

These puffs of cannon-smoke and, strange to say, the sounds that accompanied them, constituted the chief charm of the spectacle.

• Puff! suddenly appeared a round, compact ball of smoke playing in violet, gray, and milk-white colors, and — bumm! would follow in a second the report of this smoke-ball.

Puff! puff! arose two balls of smoke jostling and blending, and — bumm! bumm! came the coalescing sounds that confirmed what the eye had seen.

Pierre gazed at the first puff of smoke, which he still saw as a round, compact ball, and before he knew it its place was taken by two balls of smoke borne off to one side, and puff— with an interval — puff, puff, rose three others, then four others, and each was followed at intervals with the bumm, bumm, bumm— genuine, beautiful, satisfying sounds. Sometimes it seemed as if these puffs of smoke were flying, sometimes as if they were standing still, while past them flew the forests, the fields, and the glittering bayonets.

On the left, over the meadows and clumps of trees, these great balls of smoke were constantly rising with their solemn voices, and still nearer, over the lowlands and along the forests, burst forth the little puffs of musket smoke which had no time to form into balls, and yet these, in precisely the same way, uttered their little reports. Trakh-ta-ta-takh! rattled the musketry.
frequent though irregular and pale in comparison with the cannon-shots.

Pierre had an intense longing to be where those puffs of smoke originated, those glittering bayonets, that movement, those sounds.

He looked at Kutuzof and at his suite, so as to compare his own impressions with those of others. All, exactly the same as he himself, and, as it seemed to him, with the same sentiment, were gazing down on the field of battle. All faces now were lighted up by that latent heat which Pierre had observed the day before, and which he understood perfectly after his conversation with Prince Andrei.

"Go on, my dear, go on; Christ be with you," Kutuzof was saying to a general standing near him, but he kept his eyes fixed on the battle-field.

On hearing this command, the general went past Pierre on his way to the descent down from the mound.

"To the crossing," replied the general, coldly and sternly, to one of the staff, who asked where he was going.

"I too, I too," said Pierre to himself, and he followed in the direction taken by the general.

The general mounted his horse, which his Cossack led forward. Pierre went to his equerry, who had his horses in charge. Asking which was the gentlest, Pierre mounted, grasped his mane, gouged his heels into the horse's flanks, and, feeling that his spectacles were going to tumble off, and that he could not possibly remove his hands from the mane and bridle, he went cantering after the general, arousing the laughter of the staff, who were looking at him from the top of the mound.

1 Gatubchik.
CHAPTER XXXI

The general whom Pierre was following rode down the slope the shortest way and then turned to the left, and Pierre, losing him from sight, galloped into a file of infantry marching in front of him. He tried to get past them in front, then at the left, and then at the right; but everywhere there were soldiers, all with anxious, eager faces, all engaged in some invisible but evidently important action. All, with similar involuntarily questioning glances, looked at this portly man in the white hat, who, for some unknown reason, insisted on trampling them down with his horse.

"What makes you ride in front of the battalion?" cried one to him. Another poked his horse with the butt-end of his musket, and Pierre, clinging to the saddle and scarcely able to restrain his plunging horse, galloped in front of the soldiers where there was room.

In front of him there was a bridge, and near the bridge other soldiers were stationed, firing. Pierre rode up to them. Not knowing it, Pierre had unwittingly approached the bridge over the Kalotcha, between Borodino and Gorki, where in the first action of the battle (called Borodino) the French made a charge.

Pierre saw that there was a bridge before him, and that on both ends of the bridge, and on the meadow, among the haycocks which he had noticed the day before, the soldiers were doing something; but, in spite of the incessant firing going on in this place, it never once occurred to him that here was the battle-field. He heard not the sounds of the bullets whizzing on all sides, or the projectiles flying over his head; he saw not the enemy on the other side of the river, and it was long before he saw the killed and wounded, although many were falling not far from him. With a smile which did not leave his lips, he glanced around him.

"What makes that man ride in front of the line?" again cried some one.

"Take the right ... take the left!" .... they cried to him.
Pierre took the left, and unexpectedly fell in with one of General Rayevsky's aides whom he knew. This aide looked fiercely at Pierre, evidently with the intention of shouting some command, but then, recognizing him, he shook his head at him.

"How come you here?" he cried, and dashed away.

Pierre, feeling that he was out of place and useless, and fearing lest he should be a hindrance to some one, galloped after the aide.

"What is this here? Can I go with you?" he asked.

"Wait a moment," replied the aide, and, riding up to a stout colonel who was stationed on the meadow, he gave him some order, and immediately turned back to Pierre.

"How do you happen to get here, count?" he asked, with a smile. "Is it out of curiosity?"

"Yes, yes," replied Pierre.

But the aide, wheeling, started to gallop away. "Here it is all right, thank God," said he, "but on the left flank, where Bagration is, there's frightfully hot work going on."

"Really?" exclaimed Pierre. "Where is that?"

"Come with me to the mound; you can see very well from there, and at our battery there it is still safe enough," said the aide.

"Yes, I will go with you," returned Pierre, looking around him and trying to discover his equerry. Then only for the first time Pierre caught sight of the wounded, dragging themselves to the rear on foot or borne on stretchers. On the same plot of meadow-land, with the windrows of fragrant hay, over which he had ridden the evening before, there lay, amidst the ranks, a soldier motionless, with his head awkwardly thrown back and his shako knocked off.

"But why have they not carried him off?" Pierre was going to ask, but, seeing the aide's stern face turned to the same spot, he refrained.

Pierre could not discover his equerry, and so he rode with the aide down across the hollow to Rayevsky's mound. Pierre's horse fell behind the aide's, and shook him at every step.
"You are apparently not used to riding on horseback, count?" suggested the aide.

"No, it's nothing; but somehow he limps badly," said Pierre, in perplexity.

"É—é! but he's wounded," said the aide, "right fore leg, above the knee. Must have been a bullet. I congratulate you, count," said he, "your 'baptism of fire'!"

Making their way through the smoke to the Sixth Corps, behind the artillery, which, unlimbered forward, was blazing away with a stunning thunder of discharges, they reached a small grove. Here in the grove it was cool and still, and smelt like autumn. Pierre and the aide dismounted and went up the hill on foot.

"Is the general here?" asked the aide, as he reached the top.

"He's just gone, he went yonder," was the answer, the men pointing to the right.

The aide glanced at Pierre, as if he did not know what to do with him now.

"Don't disturb yourself," said Pierre. "I will go to the top of the mound, can't I?"

"Yes, do so; you can see everything from there, and it won't be so dangerous. And I will come back after you."

Pierre went to the battery, and the aide went on his way. They did not meet again, and not till long after did Pierre learn that this aide lost an arm on that day.

The kurgan, or mound, on which Pierre had come, became afterwards known to the Russians as the Kurgan battery or Rayevsky's battery, and to the French as la grande redoute, la fatale redoute, la redoute du centre. It was the place around which tens of thousands of men were slain, and the French considered it the most important point of the whole position.

This redoubt consisted of the kurgan, on three sides of which trenches had been dug. In this place, surrounded by the trenches, were stationed ten active cannon, discharging through the embrasures of the earthworks.

In a line with the kurgan, cannon were stationed, on either side, also belching forth continuous discharges. A little to the rear of the cannon stood the infantry.

Pierre, on reaching this kurgan, never once dreamed that this small space intrenched with earthworks where he was standing, and where a few cannon were in full blast, was the most important point of the whole battle. On the contrary, it seemed to Pierre that this place, simply because he had come to it, was one of the most unimportant places of the battle-field.

On reaching the kurgan, Pierre sat down at one end of a trench which inclosed the battery, and with a smile of unconscious satisfaction gazed at what was going on around him. Occasionally with the same smile he would get to his feet, and, at the same time trying not to be in the way of the soldiers who were loading and pushing forward the guns or constantly passing him with powder and shot, he would walk through the battery. The cannon in this battery were constantly fired one after another with an overwhelming crash, and the whole place was swathed in gunpowder smoke.

In contradistinction to that sense of gloom which is always felt among the infantry soldiers of a covering force, in a battery where a small band of men are limited and shut off from the rest by a trench, here there is a sort of family feeling, which is shared equally by all.

The appearance of Pierre's unmilitary figure, in his white hat, at first struck these men unpleasantly. The soldiers passing him looked askance at him with a mixture of amazement and timidity. The senior artillery officer,—a tall, long-legged, pock-marked man,—under the pretense of inspecting the behavior of the endmost cannon, came where Pierre was and gazed inquisitively at him.

A young, round-faced little officer, still a mere lad, who had evidently just come out of the "Korpus," and who was very zealously commanding the two guns committed to his charge, looked fiercely at Pierre.

"We must ask you, sir, to go away; you cannot remain here."

The soldiers shook their heads disapprovingly, as they looked at Pierre. But when all were convinced that this man in the white hat was not only doing no harm as he sat calmly on the talus of the trench or walked up and down the battery, facing the missiles as steadily as if he were on the boulevard, and with his genial smile politely making way for the soldiers, then gradually this feeling of disapproval and perplexity began to give place to an affectionate and jocose sympathy such as soldiers are apt to manifest for dogs, cocks, goats, and other animals that are found in their ranks. These soldiers instantly adopted Pierre into their family, and gave him a nickname. "Nash barin" — "Our gentleman" — was what they called him, and they good-naturedly laughed about him among themselves.

A round shot tore up the earth within two paces of Pierre. Shaking off the dirt which the missile scattered over him, Pierre glanced around with a smile.

"Did n't that frighten you, barin? truly, didn't it?" asked a broad soldier with a rubicund face, displaying his strong white teeth.

"Why, are you afraid?" retorted Pierre.

"How can one help it?" replied the soldier. "You see, she has no mercy. If she strikes, your innards fly! So one can't help being afraid," said he, with a laugh.

Several soldiers with jovial, friendly faces were standing near Pierre. They seemed not to have expected him to speak like other men, and to find that he did surprised them.

"Soldiering's our business. But this man is a barin, so it's wonderful! What a barin he is!"

"To your places," commanded the young officer to the soldiers collecting around Pierre. This young officer was evidently for the first or perhaps the second time on duty of this kind, and accordingly he behaved to his men and his superiors with especial preciseness and formality. The rolling thunder of the cannon and of the musketry was intensified all over the field, noticeably at the left, where Bagration's fleches were situated; but Pierre, owing to the smoke of the discharges, could see nothing at all from where he was.
Moreover, Pierre's entire attention was absorbed in watching what was going on in this little family circle, as it were—separated from all the rest. His first unconsciously joyous feeling aroused by the sights and sounds of the battle-field had changed character, now, especially since he had seen that soldier lying by himself on the meadow. As he sat now on the talus of the trench he contemplated the faces around him.

It was only ten o'clock, but a score of men had been already carried from the battery; two of the cannon were dismounted, and the missiles were falling into the battery with greater and greater frequency, and the shot flew over their heads screeching and whizzing. But the men who were serving the battery seemed to pay no heed to this; on all sides were heard only gay talk and jests.

"Old stuffing!" cried a soldier to a shell that flew close over his head with a whizz.

"This is the wrong place. Go to the infantry," added a second, perceiving that the shell flew over and struck in the ranks of the covering forces.

"What is that, an acquaintance of yours?" asked another, with a laugh, as a muzhik bowed under a round shot that went flying over.

A few soldiers collected around the breastwork, trying to make out what was going on at the front.

"Well, they've captured the lines, do you see; they're retreating," said they, pointing across the breastwork.

"Mind your own business," cried an old non-commissioned officer. "If they're retreating, of course it's because they're needed elsewhere."

And the non-commissioned officer, seizing one of the soldiers by the shoulder, gave him a boost with his knee. A roar of laughter was heard.

"Serve No. 5! Forward!" rang out on one side.

"A long pull, and a strong pull, and a pull all together," cheerfully shouted the men who were pushing the cannon forward.

1 Chinyonka: any object filled with anything.
“Ar! that one almost took our barin’s hat off,” cried the rubicund jester, with a laugh which showed his teeth. — “Ekh! you beastly thing,” he added reproachfully to the ball, which carried off a gun-wheel and a man’s leg.

“Well, you foxes!” cried another, with a laugh, to the militiamen, who, all bent double, came forward to the battery, to remove the wounded. “Is n’t this gruel to your taste? Akh! you crows!¹ are you frozen stiff?” cried the soldiers to the militiamen, who were dismayed at the sight of the soldier with the leg torn off. “That’s only a little one!” said they, imitating the dialect of the peasants. “Don’t like to be afraid, do you?”

Pierre observed how after the fall of each new missile, after each new loss, the general excitement became more and more intensified.

Just as when a heavy thunder-shower is approaching, more and more frequently, more and more dazzlingly, flashed forth on the faces of all these men the lightnings of that latent but now developing heat. It was apparently called forth by resistance.

Pierre did not look out on the battle-field, and he was not interested in knowing what was going on there; he was entirely absorbed in the contemplation of this ever more and more developing fire, which now in exactly the same way—he was conscious—was also kindling in his own soul.

At ten o’clock, the infantry, who had been in front of the battery, in the thickets, and along the Kamenka, or Stony Brook, retreated. From the battery they could be seen running back past it, carrying their wounded on their muskets.

A general with his suite dashed up the kurgan, and, after exchanging a few words with the colonel and giving Pierre a fierce look, rode back down again, ordering the covering infantry who were stationed behind the battery to lie down, so as not to expose themselves to the missiles. Immediately after this, in the ranks of the infantry, at the right of the battery, were heard the rolling of a drum and shouts of command, and they in the battery could see how the ranks of infantry moved forward.

¹ Voronui: crows; means also simpletons.

Pierre looked over the breastworks. One face especially struck his eye. This was a pale-faced young officer, who was marching with them backwards, holding his sword-point down and looking anxiously around.

The ranks of infantry disappeared in the smoke, their prolonged cheer was heard and the continuous rattle of their musketry fire. After a few minutes a throng of wounded men walking and on stretchers came straggling back.

The missiles kept falling with greater and greater frequency on the battery. A number of soldiers lay unattended. The men around the cannon were working with renewed vigor and zeal. No one any longer paid attention to Pierre. Twice he was angrily told that he was in the way. The senior officer, with a frowning face, strode with long, swift steps from gun to gun.
The young officer, with his face more flushed than ever, gave his commands to his men with ever increasing vehemence. The soldiers came and went with the projectiles, and loaded and did their duty with ever more zealously burning activity and dash. They jumped about as if they were moved by springs.

The thunder-cloud had come close at hand, and brightly on all faces burned that fire the kindling of which Pierre had been watching. He was standing near the senior officer. The young officer came hastening to the elder and saluted him, finger at vizor.

"I have the honor of reporting, Mr. Colonel, that there are only eight shot left. Do you order us to go on?"

"Grape!" cried the old officer, gazing over the rampart, and not giving any definite answer.

Suddenly something happened: the little officer shrieked, and fell upon the ground all of a heap, like a bird shot on the wing. Everything became strange, dark, and gloomy in Pierre's eyes.

One following another the projectiles came screaming, and buried themselves in the breastwork, among the soldiers, among the cannon. Pierre, who before had not heard these sounds, now heard nothing except these sounds. At one side, at the right of the battery, with their cheers — hurrah! hurrah! — the soldiers were running, not forward as it seemed to Pierre, but back to the rear.

A shot struck on the very edge of the rampart where Pierre was standing, scattered the earth, and a black ball flashed in front of his eyes and at the same instant fell with a dull thud into something. The militia, who had been coming up to the battery, were in full retreat.

"All grape!" cried the officer.

The non-commissioned officer hastened up to his senior, and in a frightened whisper — just as at dinner the butler reports to his master that the wine called for is all out — reported that all the ammunition was used up.

"The villains! what are they doing?" cried the officer, turning round to Pierre. The old officer’s face was flushed and sweaty, his eyes were gleaming fiercely.

"Run back to the reserves, have the caissons brought," he cried, crossly avoiding Pierre’s glance and addressing his command to his orderly.

"I will go," cried Pierre. The officer, without answering him, went with long strides to the other side.

"Don’t fire!.... Wait!" he shouted.

The soldier who had been commanded to go after ammunition ran into Pierre.

"Ekh! barin, this is no place for you here," said he, and started on the run down the slope.

Pierre ran after the soldier, avoiding the place where the young officer lay.

One shot, a second, a third, flew over his head; they struck in front of him, on both sides of him, and behind him. Pierre ran down the slope.

The question, "Where am I going?" suddenly occurred to him, even while he was hastening up to the green caissons. He stopped irresolutely, undecided whether to go forward or back. Suddenly a terrible shock threw him back on the ground. At the same instant a sheet of a mighty fire flashed into his eyes, and at the same instant a noise like a thunder-clap, stunning and terrific, a crash and a whizz, overwhelmed him.

Pierre, having recovered his senses, sat up, supporting himself on his hands. The caisson near which he had been standing had disappeared; only on the scorched grass were scattered a few pieces of the green painted wood of the carriage, and smoking rags; and one horse, shaking off the fragments of the shafts, was galloping off, while another—like Pierre himself—was lying on the ground, and uttering a long penetrating scream of agony.

CHAPTER XXXII

Pierre, in his terror, not knowing what he was doing, sprang to his feet and ran back to the battery, as if it were the only refuge from the horrors surrounding him. When he reached the intrenchment, he observed that there was no sound of firing any longer from the battery, but that men were engaged in doing something there. Pierre had no time to make out who these men were. He saw the old colonel leaning over the breastwork, with his back to him, as if he were watching something below, and he saw one of the artillerists, whom he had already observed, struggling to get away from some men who had him by the arm, and crying "Brothers! Brothers!" and he also saw something else that was strange.

But he had no time to realize that the colonel was killed, and that the man was crying for help, and that under his very eyes a second soldier was stabbed in the back by a bayonet thrust. He had hardly set foot in the intrenchment before a lean, sallow, sweaty-faced man, in a blue uniform, with a sword in his hand, leaped upon him, shouting something. Pierre instinctively avoided the shock, as men do who are about to run into each other, and, putting out his hand, he seized this man—he was a French officer—by the shoulder with one hand and grasped his throat with the other. The officer, dropping his sword, seized Pierre by the collar.

For some seconds they each gazed with startled eyes into the other's face, and both were uncertain as to what they had done and what they were going to do. "Has he taken me prisoner, or have I taken him prisoner?" each of them was wondering. But apparently the French officer was rather inclined to believe that he was taken prisoner, for the reason that Pierre's powerful hand, involuntarily clenching under the influence of fear, was squeezing his throat ever tighter and tighter. The Frenchman was just trying to say something, when suddenly over their very heads, narrowly missing them and terribly screeching, flew a projectile, and it seemed to Pierre that the French officer's head was torn off, so quickly he ducked it.

Pierre also ducked his head, and released his hand. No longer puzzling over the question which had taken the other prisoner, the Frenchman ran back to the battery, while Pierre ran down the hill, stumbling over the dead and wounded, who, it seemed to him, grasped after his feet. But he had not more than reached the bottom before he came full upon a dense mass of Russian soldiers, who, stumbling and falling and cheering, full of dash and spirit, were on the double-quick toward the battery.

This was the charge for which Yermolof took the credit, declaring that only by his gallantry and good fortune was it possible to have achieved this success—the charge during which one might say he scattered over the mound the St. George crosses that had been in his pockets.

The French who had taken the battery fled. Our troops, with cheers, drove the French so far beyond the battery that it was hard to bring them to a halt.

The prisoners were led away from the battery, in their number a wounded French general, around whom the officers crowded.

A throng of wounded, Russians and French, some of them known and many unknown to Pierre, their faces distorted with agony, crawled or limped, or were carried away from the battery on stretchers.

Pierre went up on the mound again, where he had spent more than an hour already, and of that little "family circle" which had, as it were, adopted him, he found not one. There were many dead lying there, but they were strangers. Some he recognized. The young officer was lying, all in a heap, as before, in a pool of blood at the edge of the parapet. The rubicund soldier was twitching a little, but they did not carry him away. Pierre went down again.

"No, now they must surely put an end to this; now they must begin to feel remorse for what they have been doing," thought Pierre, aimlessly taking the same direction as the line of litters moving from the battlefield.

But the sun, obscured by smoke, was still high in the heavens, and at the front, and especially at the left at Semenovskoye, there was a great commotion in the smoke, and the thunder of guns and cannon not only did not slacken, but rather increased, even to desperation, like a man who, perishing, collects his forces to utter one last cry.

CHAPTER XXXIII

The principal action in the battle of Borodino took place on a space of a thousand sazhens,¹ between Borodino and Bagration's earthworks.

Outside of this space there had occurred, about noon, on one side, a demonstration on the part of Uvarof's Russian cavalry; on the other, beyond Utitsa, the skirmish between Poniatowski and Tutchkof had taken place; but these were two distinct engagements, and insignificant in comparison with what went on in the middle of the battle-field.

On this field, between Borodino and the fleches, near the forest, on an open tract visible from both sides, the principal action of the battle was fought in the simplest, most artless manner imaginable.

¹ A sazhen is seven feet; five hundred sazhens make a verst.

The action began with a cannonade on both sides, from several hundred cannon.

Then, when the smoke had settled down on the whole field, forward through it, on the side of the French, at the right, moved the two divisions of Dessaix and Campan against the earthworks, and at the left moved the viceroy's regiments against Borodino.

From the Shevardino redoubt, where Napoleon had taken up his position, the distance to Bagration's fleches was about a verst, while Borodino was upwards of two versts distant in a straight line, and, consequently, Napoleon could not see what was going on there,—all the more from the fact that the smoke, mingling with the mist, covered the whole locality.

The soldiers of Dessaix's division, as they moved against the fleches, were visible only until they began to descend the ravine which separated them from the earthworks. As soon as they descended into the ravine, the smoke of the cannon and musketry from the earthworks was so dense that it wholly curtained off everything on the farther side of the ravine.

Through the smoke, here and there, gleamed some black object, apparently a body of men, and from time to time the glittering of bayonets. But whether they were moving or standing still, whether they were French or Russians, it was impossible to distinguish from the Shevardino redoubt.

The sun came out bright, and shone with its slanting rays full into Napoleon's face, as he looked from under the shade of his hand toward the fleches.

The smoke hung like a curtain in front of them, and sometimes it seemed that the smoke was in motion, sometimes that the troops were in motion. Occasionally, above the noise of the musketry, the shouts of men could be heard; but it was impossible to know what they were doing.

Napoleon, standing on the knoll, gazed through his field-glass, and in the small circlet of the instrument he could see smoke and men, sometimes his own, sometimes Russians; but when he came to use his naked eye, he could not find even where he had been looking but the moment before.

He went down from the redoubt, and began to pace back and forth in front of it.

Occasionally he paused and listened to the firing, or strained his sight to see the battle-field.

Not only from that lower ground where he was standing, not only from the mound on which some of his generals were left, but likewise from the fleches themselves, where, now together and now alternately, Russians and French were in the fore, crowded with soldiers, dead and wounded, panic-stricken or frenzied, was it impossible to make out what was going on in that place.

For several hours, amid the incessant firing of musketry and cannon, now the Russians appeared in the ascendant, and now the French; now the infantry, and now the cavalry; they showed themselves, they fell, they fired, they struggled hand to hand; not knowing what they were doing to one another, they shouted and they retreated.

Napoleon's aides and his marshals' orderlies kept galloping up from the battle-field with reports as to the progress of affairs; but all these reports were false for the reason that, in the heat of the engagement, it was impossible to say what was taking place at a given moment; and for the reason that many of the aides did not reach the actual place of conflict, but reported what they had heard from others; and again for the reason that, while any aide was traversing the two or three versts which separated his starting-point from Napoleon, the circumstances must have changed, and the tidings have become false.

Thus the viceroy sent an aide post-haste with the tidings that Borodino had been captured and the bridge over the Kalotcha was in the hands of the French. The aide asked Napoleon whether he would command the troops to make a flank movement.
Napoleon commanded them to be drawn up into line on the other side of the river and to wait, but at the time when Napoleon issued this command — nay more, even before the aide had fairly left Borodino — the bridge was recaptured and burned by the Russians, in fact, during that very skirmish in which Pierre had participated at the beginning of the battle.

Another aide, galloping up from the fleches with frightened face, reported to Napoleon that the charge had been repulsed, and that Campan was wounded and Davoust killed; but, in reality, the fleches had been recaptured by another division of the troops at the very moment that the aide was told that the French were defeated, and Davoust was alive, and suffering only from a slight contusion.

Drawing his own conclusions from such unavoidably false reports, Napoleon made his dispositions, which either were already fulfilled before he had made them, or else could not be, and never were, fulfilled.

The marshals and generals, who were at closer touch with the battle-field, but who, nevertheless, just like Napoleon, did not actually take part in the battle itself, and only rarely came actually under fire, did not ask Napoleon, but made their dispositions, and gave their orders as to where and whence to fire, and when to have the cavalry charge and the infantry take to the double-quick.

But even their dispositions, exactly like Napoleon's, were only in small measure and rarely carried out. For the most part, exactly the opposite of what they ordered was carried into effect. Soldiers commanded to advance would be exposed to a fire of grape, and retreat; soldiers commanded to hold their ground, suddenly seeing an unexpected body of Russians coming against them, would sometimes rush on to meet them, and the cavalry without orders would gallop off to cut down the fleeing Russians.

Thus two regiments of cavalry dashed down through the ravine of Semenovskoye, and as soon as they reached the hilltop they faced about and galloped back at breakneck speed.
In the same way, the infantry soldiers oftentimes moved about, sometimes going on the double-quick in directions entirely different from what they were ordered to go.

All dispositions as to where and when cannon were to be unlimbered, when the infantry were to be sent forward, when to fire, when the cavalry were to hammer down the Russian infantry,—all these dispositions were made on their own responsibility by the subordinate heads who were close at hand, in the ranks, and they did not stop to consult either with Ney or Davoust or Murat, and certainly not with Napoleon. They had no fear of blame for their commands not being carried out, or for arbitrary orders issued, because in a battle the issue at stake is man's most precious possession—his own life, and it often seems that his safety lies in retreating, often in advancing at the double-quick; and so those men who were in the smoke of the battle acted in conformity with the needs of the moment.

In reality, all these movements back and forth did not relieve and did not change the positions of the troops. All their collisions and charges, one against the other, produced very little injury, but the injuries, the deaths, and the mutilations were brought by the projectiles and shots which were flying in all directions over that space where these men were pelting one another. As soon as these men left that space where the shot and shell were flying, then immediately their nachalniks, stationed in the rear, would bring them into order again, subject them to discipline, and, under the influence of this discipline, lead them back to the domain of the projectiles, where again under the influence of the fear of death they would lose their discipline and become subject to whatever disposition was paramount in the throng.
Napoleon's generals, — Davoust, Ney, and Murat, — finding themselves near to this domain of fire, and sometimes even riding up into it, more than once led into this domain of fire enormous and well-ordered masses of troops. But, contrary to what had invariably happened in all their former engagements, instead of the expected report that the enemy were fleeing, these well-ordered masses of troops returned thence in disorderly, panic-stricken throngs.

Then again they would collect them, but each time in diminished numbers. In the afternoon, Murat sent his aide to Napoleon for reinforcements.

Napoleon was sitting at the foot of the mound, drinking punch, when Murat's aide-de-camp came galloping up with the report that the Russians would be defeated if his majesty would send one more division.

"Reinforcements?" exclaimed Napoleon, in grim amazement, as if not realizing the meaning of his words, and looking at the handsome young aide, who wore his dark hair in long curls just as Murat wore his. "Reinforcements!" muttered Napoleon. "How can they ask for reinforcements when they already have in their hands half of the army to throw against the weak, unfortified Russian flank! — Tell the king of Naples," said Napoleon, sternly, "tell the king of Naples that it is not noon, and that I do not yet see clearly on my chess-board. ....Go!" ....

The handsome young aide-de-camp with the long hair, not removing his hand from his hat, drew a heavy sigh, and galloped back again to the place where they were slaughtering men.

Napoleon got up, and, calling Caulaincourt and Berthier, began to discuss with them concerning matters that had nothing to do with the battle.

In the midst of this conversation, which began to engross Napoleon, Berthier's eyes were attracted to a general with his suite who came galloping up to the mound on a sweaty horse.

This was Belliard. Throwing himself from his horse, he approached the emperor with swift strides, and boldly, in a loud voice, began to show forth the imperative necessity of reinforcements.

He swore on his honor that the Russians were beaten if the emperor would only give them one division more. Napoleon shrugged his shoulders, and, without making any reply, kept on walking back and forth. Belliard began to talk loud and earnestly with the generals of the suite gathered round him.

"You are very hot-headed, Belliard," exclaimed Napoleon, again approaching the general who had brought the message. "It is easy to make a mistake in the thick of battle. Go back and look again, and then return to me."

Hardly had Belliard time to disappear from sight when, from the other side, a new messenger came hastening up from the battle-field.

"Well, what is it?" demanded Napoleon, in the tone of a man annoyed by importunate difficulties.

"Sire, the prince ...." began the aide-de-camp.

"Wants reinforcements?" said Napoleon, with a furious gesture, taking the words out of his mouth. The aide-de-camp bowed his head affirmatively, and began to make his report; but the emperor turned away, took a couple of steps, paused, turned back, and addressed Berthier.

"We must give them the reserves," said he, slightly throwing open his hands. "Which shall we send, think you?" he asked, addressing Berthier, "that gosling which I made into an eagle — oiseon que j'ai fait aigle," as he was of late in the habit of calling him.

"Sire, send Claparède's division," suggested Berthier, who knew by heart every division, regiment, and battalion.

Napoleon nodded approval.

The aide-de-camp dashed off to Claparède's division, and, within a few minutes, the Young Guard, who were drawn up back of the mound, were on the way. Napoleon looked on in silence at this movement.

"No," he cried, suddenly turning to Berthier, "I cannot send Claparède. Send Friant's division," said he.

Although there was no advantage in sending Friant's division rather than Claparède's, and the delay caused by recalling Claparède and sending Friant was unfortunate, still this order was carried out to the letter. Napoleon did not see that in thus treating his forces he was playing the part of a doctor who, by his very remedies, hinders recovery — a part which he thoroughly appreciated and criticized.

Friant's division, like the others, also vanished in the smoke that hung over the battle-field. From all sides aides kept galloping up with reports, and all, as if by previous agreement, had one and the same story to tell. All asked for reinforcements, all declared that the Russians were holding desperately to their positions and that they were returning an infernal fire — un feu d'enfer — under which the French troops were melting away.

Napoleon, in deep thought, sat down on a camp-chair. M. de Beausset, who was so fond of traveling, and had been fasting since early morning, came up to the emperor, and permitted himself the boldness of respectfully proposing to his majesty to eat some breakfast.

"I hope that I am not premature in congratulating your majesty on a victory," said he.

Napoleon silently shook his head. M. de Beausset, taking it for granted that this negation was a disclaimer of victory and did not refer to breakfast, permitted himself in a playfully respectful manner to remark that there was no reason on earth why they should not have some breakfast when they could have some.

"Allez vous ...." suddenly cried Napoleon, gruffly, and turned his back on him. A beatific smile of pity, regret, and enthusiasm irradiated M. Beausset's face, and with a swaggering gait he rejoined the other generals.

Napoleon was under the sway of a gloomy feeling like that experienced by a universally fortunate gamester, who has senselessly staked his money because he was always sure of winning, and suddenly, just at the time when he has calculated all the chances of the game, is brought to the knowledge that the more he puzzles over its course, the more surely he is losing.

The troops were the same, the generals were the same, the preparations were the same, the same dispositions, the same proclamation courte et énergique; he himself was the same,—he knew it; he knew that he was vastly better in experience and skill than he had ever been before; even the enemy were the same as at Austerlitz and Friedland,—but the terrible crushing blow of the hand fell powerless as if magic interfered.

All those former measures which had been invariably crowned with success,—the concentration of all the batteries on one spot, and the attack of the reserves for crushing the lines, and the charge of the cavalry—his men of iron,—all these measures had already been employed, and not only there was no victory, but from all sides the same stories about generals killed and wounded, about the necessity of reinforcements, about the impossibility of defeating the Russians, and about the demoralization of the troops.

Hitherto, after two or three moves, two or three hasty orders, marshals and aides-de-camp would come galloping up with congratulations and joyous faces, announcing whole corps of prisoners as trophies, des faisceaux de drapeaux et d'aigles ennemis—sheaves of standards and eagles taken from the foe—and cannon, and provision trains; and Murat would only ask for permission to let the cavalry set forth to gather in the booty. This was the case at Lodi, Marengo, Arcole, Jena, Austerlitz, Wagram, and so on, and so on. But now, something strange had happened to his warriors!

Notwithstanding the report that the fleches had been captured, Napoleon saw that this success was different, entirely different, from what had been the case in all his other battles. He saw that the feeling which he experienced was also experienced by all the men around him who were familiar with military affairs. All faces were gloomy, all eyes were averted. Beausset alone failed to understand the significance of what was happening.

Napoleon, after his long experience of war, well knew what it meant that, after eight hours’ steady fighting, after the expenditure of such efforts, victory had not crowned the attacking columns. He knew that it was almost a defeat, and that the slightest mischance might now, at this critical point on which the battle was balancing, ruin him and his army.

When he passed in review all this strange Russian campaign, in which not one victory had been won,—in which, for two months, not a standard, not a cannon, not a squad of men had been captured; when he looked at the openly dejected faces of those around him, and heard the reports that the Russians still stood their ground,—a terrible feeling, like that experienced in nightmares, seized him, and all the unfortunate circumstances that might ruin him came into his mind.

The Russians might fall on his left wing, might break through his center, a random projectile might even kill him! All this was possible. In his previous battles, he had reckoned only with the chances of success; now, an infinite number of possible mischances confronted him, and he expected them all. Yes, this was just as in a dream, when a man imagines that a murderer is attacking him, and the man, in his dream, brandishes his arms, and strikes his assailant with a tremendous force which he knows must annihilate him, and then feels that his arm falls weak and limp as a rag, and the horror of inevitable destruction, because he is helpless, seizes him.

The report that the Russians were really charging the left flank of the French army awoke in Napoleon this horror. He sat in silence at the foot of the mound, on his camp-chair, with his head bent, and his elbows on his knees. Berthier came to him, and proposed to him to ride around the line, so as to assure himself how affairs really stood.

“What? What did you say?” asked Napoleon.

“Yes, have my horse brought.”

He mounted, and rode toward Semenovskoye.
In the slowly dissipating gunpowder smoke that spread all over this space where Napoleon was riding, in the pools of blood, lay horses and men, singly and in heaps. Such a horror, such a collection of slaughtered men, neither Napoleon nor any of his generals had ever seen on so small a space. The thunder of the cannon, which had not ceased rolling for ten hours, and had become a torment to the ear, gave a peculiar significance to this spectacle (like music to tableaux-vivants).

Napoleon rode to the height over Semenovskoye, and through the smoke he could see ranks of men in uniforms the colors of which were unfamiliar to his eyes. They were the Russians.

The Russians, in dense rows, were posted behind Semenovskoye and the mound, and their cannon, all along the line, were incessantly roaring, and filling the air with smoke. This was not a battle. It was wholesale butchery, incapable of bringing any advantage to either the Russians or the French.

Napoleon reined in his horse, and again fell into that brown study from which Berthier had aroused him. He could not put an end to this affair which was going on in front of him and around him, and which seemed to have been regulated by him and to have been contingent upon his fiat; and this affair, in consequence of this his first failure, for the first time made him realize all its uselessness and horror.

One of the generals who came galloping up to Napoleon permitted himself to propose that the Old Guard should be sent into the battle. Ney and Berthier, who were standing near Napoleon, exchanged glances, and smiled scornfully at this general’s senseless proposal.

Napoleon let his head sink on his breast, and was long silent.

"We are eight hundred leagues from France, and I will not have my Guard destroyed!" said he; and, turning his horse, he rode back to Shevardino.
Kutuzof, with his gray head sunk down, and his heavy body sprawled out on a rug-covered bench, was sitting in the same place where Pierre had seen him that morning. He gave no definite orders, but merely approved or disapproved of what was reported to him.

"Yes, yes, do so," he would answer to the various suggestions. "Yes, yes, go, my dear, go and see!" he would say to this one or that of those near him; or, "No, it is not necessary, we had better wait," he would say.

He listened to the reports brought to him, gave his commands when this was considered necessary by his subordinates; but even while he was listening to what was said to him, he was apparently not interested in the sense of the words so much as in the expression of the faces, in the tone of voice, of those who brought the reports. Long experience in war had taught him, and his years of discretion had made him realize, that it is impossible for one man to direct a hundred thousand men engaged in a death struggle, and he knew that the issue of a battle is determined, not by the plans of the commander-in-chief, not by the place where the troops are stationed, not by the number of the cannon or the multitude of the slain, but by that imponderable force called the spirit of the army; and he made use of this force, and directed it, as far as it was in his power.

The general expression of Kutuzof's face was one of calm concentrated attention and energy, scarcely able to overcome the weariness of his old and feeble frame.

At eleven o'clock in the morning, he was informed that the fleches captured by the French had been re-taken, but that Prince Bagration was wounded. Kutuzof groaned, and shook his head.

"Go to Prince Piotr Ivanovitch, and learn the particulars what and how," said he to one of his aides; and immediately after he turned to the Prince of Würtemberg, who was standing just back of him:—
"Would not your highness like to take command of the first division?"

Soon after the prince's departure, so soon, in fact, that he could not have reached Semenovskoye, the prince's aide came back, and informed his serene highness that the prince wished more troops.

Kutuzof frowned, and sent word to Dokhturof to take command of the first division, and begged the prince to return to him, as, so he said, he could not do without him at this important crisis.

When the report was brought that Murat was taken prisoner, and the staff hastened to congratulate Kutuzof, he smiled.

"Wait, gentlemen," said he. "There is nothing extraordinary in the victory being won, and Murat being a prisoner. But it is best to postpone our elation."

Nevertheless, he sent one of his aides to ride along the lines, and announce this news to the troops.

When Shcherbinin came spurring up from the left flank to report that the French had captured the fleches and Semenovskoye, Kutuzof, judging from the sounds on the battle-field and by Shcherbinin's face that he was bringing bad news, got up, as if to stretch his legs, and, taking Shcherbinin by the arm, he led him to one side.

"Go, my dear,"¹ said he to Yermolof, "go and see if it is impossible to do anything."

Kutuzof was at Gorki, the center of the position of the Russian troops. The assaults on our left flank, directed by Napoleon, had been several times repulsed. At the center the French had not pushed beyond Borodino. On the right Uvarof's cavalry had put the French to flight.

At three o'clock the French attack began to slacken in violence. On the faces of all who came from the battle-field and of all who stood around him, Kutuzof read an expression of the most intense excitement. Kutuzof was satisfied with the success of the day, which surpassed his expectations. But the old man's physical strength began to desert him. Several times his head sank forward, as if out of his control, and he dozed. They brought him something to eat.

¹ Galubchik.

Flügel-adjutant Woltzogen, the one who, as he rode past Prince Andrei, had declared that the war must spread into the country,—im Raum verlegen,— and whom Bagration so detested, came riding up while Kutuzof was eating his dinner. Woltzogen came from Barclay with a report as to the course of affairs on the left wing. The prudent Barclay de Tolly, seeing the throngs of wounded hastening to the rear, and the ragged ranks of the army, and taking all circumstances into consideration, decided that the battle was lost, and sent his favorite with this news to the general-in-chief.

Kutuzof laboriously mumbled a piece of roasted chicken and gazed at Woltzogen with squinting, jocose eyes.

Woltzogen, stretching his legs negligently, with a half-scornful smile on his lips, came to Kutuzof, barely lifting his hand to his vizor. He behaved to his serene highness with a certain affectation of indifference, which was intended to show that he, as a highly cultured military man, permitted the Russians to make an idol of this good-for-nothing old man, but that he knew with whom he was dealing. "*Der alte Herr—*the old gentleman," as Kutuzof was called by the Germans in his circle—"*macht sich ganz bequem—*is taking things very easy," said Woltzogen to himself; and, casting a stern glance at the platter placed in front of Kutuzof, he proceeded to report to the old gentleman the position of affairs on the left flank, as Barclay had told him to do, and as he himself had seen and understood them.

"All the points of our position are in the enemy's hands, and we cannot regain them, because we have no troops; they are in full retreat, and there is no possibility of stopping them," was his report.

Kutuzof, ceasing to chew, stared at Woltzogen in amazement, as if he did not comprehend what was said to him.

Woltzogen, observing the alter Herr's excitement, said, with a smile,—"I did not feel that it was right to conceal from your serene highness what I have been witnessing. The troops are wholly demoralized.'"....

"You have seen it? You have seen it?"... screamed Kutuzof, scowling, and leaping to his feet, and swiftly approaching Woltzogen. "How.... how dare you?".... and he made a threatening gesture with his palsied hands, and, choking, he cried: "How dare you, dear sir, say this to me? You know nothing about it. Tell General Barclay from me that his observations are false, and that the actual course of the battle is better known to me, the commander-in-chief, than it is to him!"

Woltzogen was about to make some remark, but Kutuzof cut him short:

"The enemy are beaten on the left and crushed on the right. If you saw things wrong, my dear sir, still you should not permit yourself to say what you know nothing about. Be good enough to go to General Barclay and tell him that it is my absolute intention to attack the enemy to-morrow," said Kutuzof, sternly.

All was silent, and all that could be heard was the heavy breathing of the excited old general.

"They are beaten all along the line, thank God and the gallantry of the Russian army for that! The enemy are crushed, and to-morrow we will drive them from the sacred soil of Russia," said Kutuzof, crossing himself, and suddenly the tears sprang to his eyes and he sobbed.

Woltzogen, shrugging his shoulders, and pursing his lips, silently went to one side, expressing his amazement at the old gentleman's conceited stubbornness—über diese Eingenommenheit des alten Herrn.

"Ah, here comes my hero," exclaimed Kutuzof, to a stalwart, handsome, dark-haired general, who at this moment approached the mound.

This was Rayevsky, who had been all that day at the critical point of the field of Borodino.

Rayevsky reported that the troops were unmoved in their positions, and that the French did not dare to attack them any more.
On hearing this, Kutuzof said in French, — "Then you do not think, as some others do, that we are forced to withdraw?"

"On the contrary, your highness, in drawn battles it is always the stubbornest who can be called victorious," replied Rayevsky, — "and my opinion...."

"Kaisarof!" cried Kutuzof, summoning his adjutant. "Sit down and write an order for to-morrow. And you," he said, addressing another, "hasten down the lines and have them understand that we attack to-morrow."

While Kutuzof was talking with Rayevsky and dictating his order of the day, Woltzogen came back from Barclay and announced that General Barclay de Tolly would like a written confirmation of the order which the field-marshal had delivered to him.

Kutuzof, not looking at Woltzogen, commanded his aides to write out the order, which the former commander-in-chief desired to have in order completely to relieve him of personal responsibility.

And by that intangible, mysterious connection which preserves throughout a whole army one and the same disposition, the so-called esprit du corps, and constitutes the chief sinew of an army, Kutuzof's words and his order for renewing the battle on the following day were known simultaneously from one end of the force to the other.

The exact words or the absolute form of the order were not indeed carried to the utmost limits of this organization; in the stories which were repeated in the widely separated ends of the lines there was very likely nothing like what Kutuzof really said; but the gist of his words was conveyed everywhere, for the reason that what Kutuzof said sprang not from logical reasoning, but was the genuine outcome of the sentiment that was in the heart of the commander-in-chief, finding a response in the heart of every Russian.

And when they knew that on the next day they were going to attack the enemy, and heard from the upper circles of the army the confirmation of what they wished to believe, these men, tortured by doubt, were comforted and encouraged.
CHAPTER XXXVI

Prince Andreï's regiment was among the reserves, which had been stationed until two o'clock behind Semenovskoye, doing nothing under the severe fire of the artillery. At two o'clock, the regiment, which had already lost more than two hundred men, was moved forward upon the trampled field of oats, on that space between Semenovskoye and the "Kurgan" battery, whereon thousands of men were killed that day, and toward which was now concentrated a tremendous fire, from several hundreds of the enemy's guns.

Without stirring from that spot, and not themselves replying with a single shot, the regiment lost here two-thirds of its effective. In front and especially at the right-hand side, amid the perpetual smoke, the cannons were booming, and from that mysterious domain of smoke which shrouded all the space in front constantly flew the hissing and swiftly screaming projectiles, and the more deliberately sputtering shells. Sometimes, as if to give a respite, a quarter-hour would pass during which all the shot and shells would fly overhead, but then, again, several men would be struck down in the course of a moment, and they were constantly engaged in dragging the dead to one side, and carrying the wounded to the rear.

With each new casualty the chances of life were diminished for those who were as yet unscathed. The regiment was posted in battalion columns at intervals of three hundred paces, but, nevertheless, all the men were under the influence of one and the same mood. All the men of the regiment were without exception silent and melancholy. Once in a while a few words were spoken in the ranks, but this conversation was always abruptly cut short each time when the thud of the falling missile was heard, and the cry of "Stretchers!"

The larger part of the time, the men of the regiment, by their chief's orders, lay low on the ground. One man, having taken off his shako, was assiduously untying and again tying up the strings; another, with dry clay fashioned into a ball in his palms, was polishing up his bayonet; another had taken off the strap and was buckling his bandoleer; still another was carefully untwisting his leg-wrappers and tying them on again, and changing his shoes.

Some dug shelters out of the plowed land, or plaited wattles out of the stubble straw. All seemed entirely absorbed in their occupations. When any of them were killed or wounded, when the litters were brought into requisition, when our men were forced back, when great masses of the enemy were seen in the smoke, no one paid any attention to these circumstances.

But when the artillery or the cavalry were moved forward, or our infantry could be seen executing some manoeuvre, approving remarks were heard on all sides. But the most attention was excited by incidents entirely extraneous, which had absolutely no relation to the battle. These morally tormented men seemed to be relieved by having their attention turned to the ordinary affairs of every-day life.

A battery of artillery passed in front of the regiment. The off horse attached to one of the caissons got entangled in the traces.

"Hey! look out for your off horse!" .... "Take care! He'll be down!" .... "Ekh! Have n't they any eyes?" Such were the remarks shouted all along the line.

Another time, general attention was attracted by a small cinnamon-colored puppy which, with its tail stiffly erect, came from God knows where, and went flying at a desperate pace in front of the ranks, and, frightened by the sudden plunge of a round shot which fell near it, set up a yelp, and sprang to one side with its tail between its legs. A roar of laughter and shouts ran along the line.

But diversions of this sort lasted only for a few minutes, while the men had been standing there for more than eight hours, without food, and inactive, under that ceaseless horror of death, and their pallid and anxious faces grew ever more pallid and more anxious.

Prince Andrei, like all the other men in his regiment anxious and pallid, paced back and forth along the meadow, next the oat-field, from one end to the other, with his arms behind his back, and with bent head. There was nothing for him to do or to order. Everything went like clockwork. The dead were dragged to one side, away from the front; the wounded were carried to the rear; the ranks were closed up. If the soldiers stood aside, they instantly hastened back to their places again.

At first Prince Andrei, considering it incumbent upon him to encourage his men and to set them an example of gallantry, kept walking up and down along the ranks; but afterwards he became convinced that they had nothing to learn from him. With all the energy of his soul, — and this was true also of every one of the soldiers, — he unconsciously tried to blind himself to the horrors of their situation.

He marched along the meadow, dragging his feet, trampling down the grass and contemplating the dust that covered his boots; then again with long strides he would try to step from ridge to ridge left by the mowers' scythes along the meadow; or, counting his steps, he would calculate how many times he must go from one boundary to the other in order to make a verst. He would pluck up the wormwood growing on the edge of the field, and rub the flowers between his palms, and sniff the powerful, penetrating bitter of their odor.

Nothing remained of the fabric of thought which he had so painfully elaborated the evening before. He thought of nothing at all. He listened with weary ears to that perpetual repetition of sounds, distinguishing the whistling of the missiles above the roar of the musketry. He gazed at the indifferent faces of the men in the first battalion, and waited.

"Here she comes!.... That's one for us," he would say to himself as he caught the approaching screech of something from that hidden realm of smoke. "One, a second! There's another! It struck!"

He paused, and looked along the ranks. "No, it went over. Ah! but that one struck!"

And once more he would take up his promenade, trying to measure long steps, so as to reach the boundary in sixteen strides.

A screech, and a thud! Within half a dozen steps from him a projectile flung up the dry soil and buried itself. An involuntary chill ran down his back. Once more he looked along the ranks: evidently many had been struck down; a great crowd had come together in the second battalion.

"Mr. Adjutant," he cried, "tell those men not to stand so close together."

The aide, having fulfilled the command, returned to Prince Andrei. From the other side the battalion commander rode up on horseback.

"Look out!" cried a soldier in a terrified voice; and, like a bird whistling in its swift flight and settling earthward, a shell came plunging down, not noisily, within two paces of Prince Andrei, and near the battalion commander's horse.

The horse, not pausing to consider whether it were well or ill to manifest fear, snorted, shied, and, almost unseating the major, darted off. The horse's panic was shared by the men.

"Lie down!" cried the aide, throwing himself on the ground.

Prince Andrei stood undecided. The shell, with its fuse smoking, was spinning like a top between him and the aide, on the very edge between the plowed land and the meadow, near the clump of wormwood.

"Can this be death?" wondered Prince Andrei, casting a fleeting glance full of a newly born envy at the grass, the wormwood, and the thread of smoke that escaped from the whirling black ball. "I cannot, I will not die; I love life, I love this grass, the earth, the air...."

All this flashed through his mind, and at the same time he remembered that they were looking at him. "For shame, Mr. Officer!" he started to say to the aide. "Any..."

He did not finish. There came simultaneously a crash, a whizzing of fragments, as of broken glass, a powerful odor of gunpowder smoke, and Prince Andrei was struck in the side, and, throwing his arms up, he fell on his face.

Several officers hastened to him. From the right side of his abdomen a great gush of blood stained the grass.

The infantry who acted as bearers came up with their stretchers, and stood behind the officers. Prince Andrei lay with his face buried in the grass, gasping painfully.

"Now, then, why loiter? come on!"

The muzhiks came close and lifted him by the shoulders and legs; but he groaned piteously, and the men, exchanging glances, laid him down again.

"Bear a hand there! Up with him! it's all the same!" cried some one's voice. Once more they took him by the shoulders, and laid him on the stretcher.

"Ah! my God! my God! What?".... "In the belly? That finishes him!".... "Akh! Bozhe moĭ!" exclaimed various officers.

"Na! a fragment whizzed past my ear," said the aide. The muzhiks, lifting the stretcher to their shoulders, hastily directed their steps along the path that they had already worn toward the "bandaging-point."

"Fall into step!.... Oh! you men!" cried an officer, halting the muzhiks, who were walking out of step and jolting the stretcher. "In step there, can't you, Khveodor,.... now, then Khveodor!" exclaimed the front muzhik.

"Now that's the way!" cheerfully replied the rear one, falling into step.

"Your illustriousness.... prince!" said Timokhin in a trembling voice, as he came up and looked at the stretcher.

Prince Andrei opened his eyes, and looked out from the stretcher in which his head was sunken, and when he saw who spoke, he again shut them.

The militiamen carried Prince Andrei to the forest, where the wagons were sheltered, and where the field lazaret had been established. This field lazaret, or bandaging-place, consisted of three tents with upturned flaps, pitched on the edge of the birch grove. Within the grove stood the wagons and horses. The horses were munching oats in haversacks, and the sparrows were pouncing down and carrying off the scattered grains; crows, scenting blood, and impatiently cawing, were flying about over the tree-tops.

Around the tents, occupying more than five acres\(^1\) of ground, lay, and sat, and stood blood-stained men in various attire.

Around the wounded stood a throng of stretcher-bearers, soldiers, with sad but interested faces, whom the officers, attempting to carry out orders, found it impossible to keep away. Not heeding the officers, the soldiers stood leaning on the stretchers and gazed steadily, as if trying to grasp the meaning of the terrible spectacle before their eyes.

From the tents could be heard now loud, fierce sobs, then pitiful groans. Occasionally, assistants would come hurrying out after water, and signify the next ones who should be brought in. The wounded by the tents, waiting their turn, hoarsely cried, groaned, wept, screamed, cursed, clamored for vodka. Some were delirious.

Prince Andrei, as regimental commander, was carried through this throng of unbanded sufferers, close to one of the tents, and there his bearers waited for further orders. He opened his eyes, and it was some time before he could comprehend what was going on around him. The meadow, the wormwood, the plowed field, the black whirling ball, and that passionate throb of love for life occurred to his recollection.

Two paces from him, talking loudly and attracting general attention, stood a tall, handsome, black-haired,

---

\(^1\) Two desyatins; a desyatina is 2.7 acres.
non-commissioned officer with a bandaged head, and leaning against a dead tree. He had been wounded in the head and leg with bullets. Around him, attracted by his talk, were gathered a throng of wounded and of stretcher-bearers.

"We gave it to him so hot that they dropped everything; they even left the king," cried the soldier, snapping his fiery black eyes and glancing around. "If only the reserves had been sent up just at that time, I tell you, brother, there would not have been left a show of him, because I am sure...."

Prince Andreï, like all the circle gathered around the speaker, gazed at him with gleaming eyes, and felt a sense of consolation. "But why is it that it is not a matter of indifference to me now?" he asked himself. "What is going to happen, and what does it mean? Why do I have such regret in leaving life? There was in this life something which I have not understood, and which I still fail to understand."

CHAPTER XXXVII

One of the surgeons, with blood-soaked apron, and with his small hands covered with gore, holding a cigar between thumb and little finger, so as not to besmear it, came out of the tent. This doctor lifted his head and proceeded to look on all sides, but beyond the wounded. He was evidently anxious to get a little rest. Having for some time looked toward the right and then toward the left, he drew a long sigh and dropped his eyes.

"In a moment now," said he, in reply to his feldscher, who called his attention to Prince Andreï, and he gave orders for him to be carried into the tent.

The throng of wounded who had been waiting was disposed to grumble. "In this world it seems only 'gentlemen' are permitted to live!" exclaimed one.

Prince Andreï was taken in and deposited on a table which had only just been vacated. The feldscher was that instant engaged in rinsing something from it.
Prince Andrei could not distinctly make out what there was in the tent. The pitiful groans on all sides, the excruciating agony in his ribs, his belly, and his back, distracted him. All that he saw around him was confused for him, in one general impression of naked, blood-stained human flesh, filling all the lower part of the tent, just as several weeks previously, on that hot August day, the same flesh had filled the filthy pond along the Smolensk highway. Yes, this was the same flesh, the same cannon-meat which even then the sight of, as if prophetic of what he now experienced, had filled him with horror.

There were three tables in this tent. Two were occupied. Prince Andrei was laid on the third. He was left to himself for some little time, and he could not help seeing what was doing at the other two tables. On the one nearest lay a Tatar,—a Cossack to judge by his uniform, which was thrown down beside him. Four soldiers held him down. A surgeon in spectacles was cutting into his cinnamon-colored, muscular back.

"Ukh! Ukh! Ukh!"—the Tatar grunted like a pig, and, suddenly turning up his swarthy face with its wide cheek-bones and squat nose, and unsheathing his white teeth, he began to tug and to struggle, and set up a long, shrill, penetrating screech.

On the other table, around which were gathered a number of people, a large, stout man lay on his back, with his head thrown back. His streaming hair, its color, and the shape of the head seemed strangely familiar to Prince Andrei.

Several of the assistants were leaning on this man's chest, and holding him down. His large, stout, white leg was subject to an incessant and rapid trembling, as if it had the ague. This man was convulsively sobbing and choking. Two surgeons—one was pale and trembling—were silently doing something to this man's other handsome leg.

Having finished with the Tatar, over whom they threw his cloak, the spectacled surgeon, wiping his hands, came to Prince Andrei. He looked into Prince Andrei's face, and hastily turned away.

"Undress him. What are you dawdling for?" he cried severely to his feldschers.

Prince Andrei's very first and most distant childhood occurred to him, as the feldscher, with hasty hands, began to unbutton his clothes and remove them. The surgeon bent down low over the wound, probed it, and drew a heavy sigh. Then he made a sign to some one.

The exquisite agony which Prince Andrei felt within his abdomen caused him to lose consciousness.

When he came to himself, the broken splinters of ribs were removed, the torn clots of flesh cut away, and the wound was dressed.

They were dashing water into his face. As soon as Prince Andrei opened his eyes, the surgeon bent silently down to him, kissed him in the lips, and hastened away.

After the agony which he had endured, Prince Andrei was conscious of a well-being such as he had not experienced for a long time.

All the best and happiest moments of his life, especially his earliest childhood, when they used to undress him and put him to bed, when his old nurse used to lull him to sleep with her songs, when, as he buried his head in the pillows, he had felt himself happy in the mere consciousness of being alive: all recurred to his imagination, no longer as something long past, but as actuality.

Around that wounded man, whose features seemed familiar to Prince Andrei, the doctors were still busy, lifting him and trying to calm him.

"Show it to me.... Ooooo! O! Ooooo!" he groaned, his voice broken by frightened sobs, subdued by suffering.

Prince Andrei, hearing these groans, felt like weeping himself: either because he was dying without fame, or because he regretted being torn from life, or because of these recollections of a childhood never to return, or because he sympathized in the sufferings of others, and this man was groaning so piteously before him; but, at any rate, he felt like weeping good, childlike, almost happy tears.
The wounded man was shown the amputated leg, still in its boot, which was full of blood.

"O! Ooooo!" and he sobbed like a woman. The surgeon, who had been standing in front of the patient, and prevented his face from being seen, stepped to one side.

"My God! what does this mean? Why is he here?" Prince Andrei wondered.

In this wretched, sobbing, exhausted man, whose leg had only just been taken off, he recognized Anatol Kuragin. They lifted Anatol's head, and gave him water in a glass; but his trembling, swollen lips could not close over the edge of the glass. Anatol was still sobbing bitterly.

"Yes, it is he! yes, this man who has been somehow so closely, so painfully, connected with my life!" said Prince Andrei to himself, not as yet realizing clearly all the circumstances. "What has been the link that connects this man with my childhood, with my life?" he asked himself, and could not find the answer to his question. And suddenly a new and unexpected remembrance from that world of the childlike, pure, and lovely past arose before Prince Andrei. He recalled Natasha just as he had seen her for the first time at the ball, in 1810, with her slender neck and arms, with her timid, happy face so easily wakened to enthusiasm, and his love and tenderness for her arose more keenly and powerfully in his soul than ever before. He remembered now the bond which existed between him and this man, who, through the tears that suffused his swollen eyes, was gazing at him with such an expression of agony. Prince Andrei remembered everything, and a solemn pity and love for this man welled up in his happy heart.

Prince Andrei could no longer restrain himself, and he wept tears of compassionate love and tenderness over other men and over himself, over their errors and his own.

"Sympathy, love for one's brothers, for those who love us, love for those who hate us, love for our enemies, yes, the love which God preached on earth, which the Princess Mariya taught me, and which I have not understood,—that is what made me feel regret for life; that is what would have remained for me if my life had been spared. But now it is too late. I know it.”

CHAPTER XXXVIII

The terrible spectacle of the battle-field, covered with corpses and wounded men, together with the heaviness of his head and the news that a score of famous generals had been killed and wounded, and together with the consciousness that his formerly powerful hands were powerless, had produced an unusual impression upon Napoleon, who, as a general thing, was fond of contemplating the killed and wounded, this being (as he thought) a proof of his mental force.

On this day the horrible spectacle of the battle-field overcame this moral force whereby he had always manifested his worth and greatness. He hastened away from the battle-field and returned to the hill of Shevardino. Sallow, bloated, apathetic, with bloodshot eyes, red nose, and hoarse voice, he sat down in his camp-chair, involuntarily listening to the sounds of the firing and not raising his eyes.

With sickening distress he awaited the end of this action, of which he regarded himself the principal participant, but which he was powerless to stay. A personal feeling of humanity for a brief moment became paramount over that artificial phantom of life which he had followed so long. He bore the weight of all the suffering and death which he had witnessed on the battle-field. The dull feeling in his head and chest reminded him of the possibility that he also might have to suffer and to die. At that instant he desired neither Moscow nor victory nor glory (and yet what glory he still required!). The one thing that he now desired was rest, repose, and liberty.
But as soon as he reached the Semenovskoye heights, an artillery general proposed to him to station a few batteries there for the sake of increasing the fire on the Russian troops massing in front of Kniazkovo. Napoleon acquiesced, and ordered a report to be made to him as to the effect produced by these batteries.

An aide-de-camp came to say that, in accordance with the emperor’s orders, two hundred cannon had been directed against the Russians, but that the Russians still held their ground.

“Our fire mows them down in rows, but still they stand,” said the aide.

“Ils en veulent encore! — They want some more of the same!” said Napoleon, in his husky voice.

“Sire?” inquired the aide, not quite understanding what the emperor said.

“Ils en veulent encore!” repeated Napoleon, in his hoarse voice, with a frown. “Donnez leurs-en — Give it them.”

Even without his orders what he did not wish was accomplished, and he repeated the form of the injunction, simply because he imagined that the injunction was expected of him. And again he returned into that former artificial world of illusions as to his majesty, and once more — like a horse which walks on the sliding plane of the treadmill and all the time imagines that he is doing something for himself — again he began stubbornly to fulfil that cruel, painful, and trying and inhuman rôle which was imposed upon him.

Not on this day and this hour only the intellect and conscience of this man, on whom weighed more heavily than on all the other participants of this action the responsibility for what was taking place, were darkened; but never, even to the end of his life, was he able to realize the goodness, or the beauty, or the truth, or the real significance of his actions, since they were too much opposed to goodness and right, too far removed from all that was human, for him to be able to realize their significance. He could not renounce his actions, since they were approved by half of the world, and consequently he was compelled to renounce truth and goodness and all that was humane.

Not on this day only when, having ridden round the field of battle strewn with dead and mutilated men,—through his volition as he fondly supposed,—as he contemplated these men, he tried to calculate how many Russians one single Frenchman stood for, and, deceiving himself, found good reason for rejoicing that one Frenchman was equal to five Russians! Not on this day only he wrote in his letter to Paris that le champ de bataille a été superbe—that the battle-field was magnificent—because there were fifty thousand corpses on it; but on the Island of Saint Helena as well, in the silence of his solitude, where he declared that he was going to devote his leisure moments to an exposition of the mighty deeds which he had accomplished, he wrote:

The Russian war should have been the most popular war of modern times: it was one of sound common sense and genuine advantage, calculated to bring peace and security to all; it was purely pacific and conservative.

Its great purpose was to put an end to contingencies and to establish security. A new horizon, new labors, would have opened up and brought well-being and prosperity to all. The European system was established; all that was left to do was to organize it.

Satisfied on these great questions, and at peace with all the world, I also should have had my Congress and my Holy Alliance. Those ideas were stolen from me. In this great council of monarchs we should have discussed our interests as in a family, and ruled the nations with a high sense of our responsibilities.

Thus Europe would soon have become in reality but a single people, and every man, wherever he might travel, would always find himself in the common fatherland. I would have insisted on all navigable rivers being free to all, on all having equal rights to all seas, and on all the great standing armies being henceforth reduced to a guard for the sovereigns.

On my return to France, being established in the heart of a country rendered great, magnificent, tranquil, glorious, I should have proclaimed her boundaries unchangeable: all future war purely defensive; all new aggrandizement anti-national. I should have made my son my partner on the throne; my dictatorship would have ended and his constitutional reign would have begun—

Paris would have become the capital of the world and the French the envy of the nations.

Then my leisure and my old days would have been devoted, during my son's royal apprenticeship, to making tours in company with the empress— with our own horses and taking our time, like a worthy country couple — through all the nooks and corners of the empire, receiving petitions, redressing wrongs, establishing wherever we went and everywhere monuments and benefactions.¹

This man, foreordained by Providence to play the painful, predestined part of executioner of the nations, persuaded himself that the end and aim of his actions was the good of the nations, and that he could have ruled the destinies of millions, and loaded them with benefits, if he had been given the power!

¹ La guerre de Russie a dû être la plus populaire des temps modernes: c'était celle du bon sens et des vrais intérêts, celle du repos et de la sécurité de tous; elle était purement pacifique et conservatrice. C'était pour la grande cause, la fin des hasards et le commencement de la sécurité. Un nouvel horizon, de nouveaux travaux allaient se dérouler, tout plein du bien-être et de la prospérité de tous. Le système Européen se trouvait fondé: il n'était plus question que de l'organiser. Satisfait sur ces grands points et tranquille partout, j'aurais eu aussi mon congrès et ma sainte-alliance. Ce sont des idées qu'on m'a volées. Dans cette réunion de grands souverains, nous aurions traités de nos intérêts en famille et compté de clerc à maître avec les peuples. L'Europe n'eut bientôt fait de la sorte véritablement qu'un même peuple, et chacun, en voyageant partout, se fut trouvé toujours dans la patrie commune. J'eus demandé toutes les rivières navigables pour tous, la communauté des mers et que les grandes armées permanentes fussent réduites désormais à la seule garde des souverains. De retour en France au sein de la patrie, grande, forte, magnifique, tranquille, glorieuse, j'eusse proclamé ses limites immuables; toute guerre future, purement offensive; tout agrandissement nouveau anti-national. J'eusse associé mon fils à l'empire; ma dictature eut fini, et son règne constitutionnel eut commencé. Paris eut été la capitale du monde, et les français l'envie des nations. Mes loisirs ensuite et mes vieux jours eussent été consacrés, en compagnie de l'impératrice et durant l'apprentissage royal de mon fils, à visiter lentement et en vrai couple campagnard, avec nos propres chevaux, tous les recoins de l'empire, recevant les plaintes, redressant les torts, semant de toutes parts et partout les monuments et les bienfaits, etc.
He wrote further concerning the Russian war as follows:

Out of the four hundred thousand men who crossed the Vistula, half were Austrians, Prussians, Saxons, Poles, Bavarians, Württembergers, Mecklenbergers, Spaniards, Italians, and Neapolitans. The imperial army, properly speaking, was one-fourth composed of Dutch and Belgians, the inhabitants of the banks of the Rhine, Piedmontese, Swiss, Genevese, Tuscans, Romans, the inhabitants of the thirty-second military district,—Bremen, Hamburg, etc.; it counted scarcely one hundred and forty thousand men who spoke French. The Russian expedition cost France less than fifty thousand men; the Russian army, during the retreat from Vilna to Moscow, in the various battles, lost four times as many as the French army; the burning of Moscow cost the life of one hundred thousand Russians, who perished of cold and starvation in the forests, and moreover, in its march from Moscow to the Oder, the Russian army suffered from the inclemency of the season. On its arrival at Vilna it counted only fifty thousand men, and at Kalish less than eighteen thousand.

He imagined that the war with Russia came about by his own will, and the horror of what took place did not stir his soul within him. He audaciously assumed the entire responsibility of the event, and his darkened intellect found justification in the fact that, among the hundreds of thousands of men destroyed, there were fewer French than Hessians and Bavarians!

CHAPTER XXXIX

Several score thousands of men lay dead in various positions and uniforms on the fields and meadows belonging to Mr. Davuidof and certain crown serfs, on those fields and meadows where for centuries the peasants of Borodino, Gorki, Shevardino, and Semenovskoye had with one accord harvested their crops and pastured their cattle.

Around the field lazarets, for several acres, the grass and ground were soaked with blood. Throngs of men, wounded and not wounded, belonging to various commands, from the one side fell back to Mozhaïsk, from the other to Valuyevo. Other throngs, weary and hungry, led by their chiefs, moved onward to the front. Still others stood in their places and went on firing.

Over the entire field where, in the morning, the sun had shone on glittering bayonets and wreaths of smoke, now lowered a wrack of damp and smoke, and the air was foul with a strange reek of nitrous fumes and blood. Clouds had gathered, and the raindrops began to fall on the dead, on the wounded, on the panic-stricken, and the weary, and the despairing. It seemed to say to them: —

'Enough!... enough! ye men! Cease!... Remember! What are ye doing?'

The men on either side, utterly weary, without nourishment and without rest, began alike to question whether it were any advantage for them longer to exterminate one another, and hesitation could be seen in every face, and in every mind the question arose: —

"Why, wherefore are ye killing and being killed? Kill whomever ye please, do whatever ye please, but as for me I will no more of it!"

This thought, toward late afternoon, burned with equal force in the heart of each. At any moment all these men might suddenly manifest their horror at what they had been doing, give it all up, and fly anywhere it might happen.

But although, toward the end of the struggle, the men began to feel all the horror of their actions, although they would have been glad to cease, some strange, incomprehensible, mysterious power still continued to direct them, and the surviving gunners,—one out of every three,—covered with sweat, grimed with powder, and stained with blood, staggering and panting with weariness, still lugged the projectiles, charged the guns, sighted them, applied the slow-matches, and the shot flew just as swiftly and viciously from the one side and the other, and crushed human forms, and still that strange affair went on which was accomplished, not by the will of men, but by the will of Him who rules men and worlds.

Any one who had looked at the vanishing remnants of the Russian army would have said that all the French needed to do would be to put forth one small last effort and the Russian army would vanish; and any one who had looked at the remnants of the French would have said that all that the Russians had to do was to make one small last effort and the French would be destroyed. But neither the French nor the Russians put forth this last effort, and the flame of the conflict slowly flickered out.

The Russians did not make this effort because they did not charge the French. At the beginning of the battle they merely stood on the road to Moscow, disputing it, and in exactly the same way they continued to stand at the end of the battle as they had stood at the beginning. But if the aim of the Russians had been to defeat the French, they could not put forth this last effort because all the Russian troops had been defeated, there was not a single division of their army that had not suffered in the engagement, and, though the Russians still held their own, they had lost a half of their troops.

The French, with the recollections of all their fifteen years of past victories, with their confidence in Napoleon's invincibility, with the consciousness that they had got possession of a portion of the battle-field, that their loss was only a quarter of their contingent, and that they had still twenty thousand in reserve, not counting the Guard, might easily have put forth this effort. The French, who were attacking the Russian army, with the intention of defeating it, ought to have made this effort, because, as long as the Russians disputed the road to Moscow, as they did before the battle began, the aim of the French was not attained, and all their efforts and losses were thrown away.

But the French did not put forth this effort.

Certain historians assert that Napoleon had only to send forward his Old Guard, who were still fresh, and the battle would have been won. To say what would have happened if Napoleon had sent forward the Guard is just the same as to say what would happen if autumn turned into spring.

It was an impossibility.

Napoleon did not send forward his Guard, not because he did not want to do it, but because it was impossible for him to do it. All the generals, all the officers and soldiers of the French army knew that it was impossible to do this, because the dejected spirit of the army would not allow it.

Napoleon was not the only one to experience that nightmare feeling that the terrible blow of the arm was falling in vain, but all his generals, all the soldiers of the French army who took part or who did not take part, after all their experiences in former battles, when, after exerting a tenth as much force as now, the enemy would be vanquished, now experienced alike a feeling of awe at that enemy which, having lost a half of its troops, still stood just as threateningly at the end as it had stood at the beginning of the engagement.

The moral force of the French attacking army was exhausted.

Victory is not that which is signalized by the fastening of certain strips of cloth called flags to poles, nor by the space on which troops have stood or are standing; but victory is moral, when the one side has been persuaded as to the moral superiority of the other and of its own weakness; and such a victory was won by the Russians over the French at Borodino.

The invading army, like an exasperated beast of prey, having received, as it ran, a mortal wound, became conscious that it was doomed; but it could not halt any more than the Russian army, which was not half so strong, could help giving way. After the shock which had been given, the French army was still able to crawl to Moscow; but there, without any new efforts on the part of the Russian troops, it was doomed to perish, bleeding to death from the mortal wound received at Borodino.
The direct consequence of the battle of Borodino was Napoleon's causeless flight from Moscow, the return along the old Smolensk highway, the ruin of the five hundred thousand men of the invading army, and the destruction of Napoleonic France, on which at Borodino was for the first time laid the hand of an opponent stronger by force of spirit!